INTRODUCTION.

Note by the Director.—Where there are obvious mistakes in the text I have made the correction which Mr. Nichols would have made in revising his MS. noting at the foot his original words. I have also added a few words at the end, founded on the Life published at Edinburgh. Mr. Nichols has left a large number of notes, of which he would doubtless have made ample use, and he had collected a number of Lady Halkett’s Meditations, of which a few specimens are printed in the Appendix.

This fragment of Lady Halkett’s autobiography having been printed without comment, it appears to the Editor the most convenient course to take a review of its contents, and to combine with a summary thereof such other particulars derived from collateral sources as may at once enlighten the obscurity in which Lady Halkett studiously wrote, and also enable the reader to appreciate more thoroughly the value of the historical information which she actually imparts.

Lady Halkett is already known in the catalogue of female authors from the publication of some of her religious writings which was made in the year 1701, and from the “Life” which is prefixed to them. That life was derived in part from the autobiography now printed. [It was re-published in 1778] and it appears in an abridged shape in Ballard’s Memoirs of Learned Ladies, 4to. 17[52], and 8vo. 17[75].

Anne Murray was born in London on the 4th of January, 1622, the younger daughter of Thomas Murray, the preceptor and subsequently Secretary to Prince Charles (afterwards King Charles I.), by Jane Drummond. In the memoirs now printed she commences her narrative by allusion to her parents, of whose extraction she declares she had no reason to be ashamed, as her father was descended from the family of the Earl of Tillebardine, and her mother from that of the Earl of Perth. The former dignity was conferred only in 1606, and the latter in 1605, therefore it was only collaterally that her parents could be related to those earls, nor has the degree of Lady Halkett's consanguinity to them been ascertained.

Her father, Thomas Murray, was already tutor to Charles Duke of York in 1605, when that prince was [in his fifth year]. An annuity of two hundred marks was granted to him on the 28th June in that year, the patent for which he surrendered on the 27th Jan. 1613-14.

Little more than a twelvemonth after, Anne Murray lost her mother. There was probably some notice of this event in the leaf now lost from the manuscript,* which will be partially supplied by the following passage from the printed Life of 1701:

— Her mother's affections who — ever after treated her more as a friend than a child, and sometime before her death made over to her, by assignation, a bond of the Earl of Kinnoul of 2,000 lib. ster., which she received with all gratitude, as a new obligation to be more dutiful and diligent in attending upon her, especially being now more infirm and sickly; which, with great care and concern, she performed, ministering to her all the spiritual and bodily help she was capable to afford. This made a very comfortable and indearing impression upon her dying mother, and filled her heart with joy in finding not only the tender affection of her daughter, but much more, the refreshing fruits of her piety and devotion. She died the 28 August, 1647, and was buried near her husband in the Savoy church.

On the 4th January, 160[9?], Mr. Murray received an additional reward in the sinecure office of Master of Sherburn Hospital, near Durham, to which "he was collated by dispensation, contrary to the statute;" but he retained the position until his death.

In August, 1621, he was involved in temporary disgrace in consequence of his having allowed his royal pupil to receive and peruse, without the King's knowledge, a treatise which had been written by Dr. George Hakewill, one of the Prince's chaplains, in opposition to the suggested match of his Highness with the Infanta of Spain. The doctor, William Hakewill his brother, Mr. Murray, and others who were privy to this business, were sent to the Tower of London.

By this well-intentioned but injudicious effort Dr. Hakewill's promotion was effectually checked, for he never attained higher preferment than that of the Archdeaconry of Surrey, which he held previously, and he was dismissed the Prince's service; but Mr. Murray probably substantiated his non-complicity to the King's satisfaction, for, within a very few months, he received the important favour of being nominated to the Provostship of Eton upon the death of the learned Sir Henry Saville. His election to that office was made on the 23rd February, 1621-2.

In 1622, only a twelvemonth after his temporary disgrace, we find him feasting the Marquis of Buckingham at Eton College, the Spanish match being then publicly acknowledged and regarded as likely to be accomplished. But Mr. Murray's enjoyment of his good fortune was short. He died on the 9th April, 1623, at the age of fifty-nine, having yielded to the effects of an operation for the stone.a

[More than a year previously, on February 23, 1621-2, Bishop Williams being required as Lord Keeper to seal the patent for Murray's presentation, wrote to the Marquis of Buckingham a letter conveying a remonstrance that the provostship should have been conferred upon a layman, as it carried with it the cure of souls of the parish of Eton.]

The authoress gives an interesting account of her education
(p. 2); and, describing her occasional recreation in the Spring Garden by St. James's Park (her mother had a house in St. Martin's Lane), waives all other particulars (p. 19) of her childish actions b until the time when her affections were first engaged, at the age of twenty-one, in 1644.

The young gentleman was a brother of her most intimate female friend, with whom she was frequently associated at the house of her sister Lady Newton, at Charlton, near Woolwich. He was Thomas Howard, the eldest son and heir apparent of Edward Lord Howard of Escrick, but any idea of a marriage with him was entirely dis-countenanced by her mother, because the Lord Howard's fortune was such as had need of a more considerable portion for his son than her mother could give her, or else it would ruin his younger children (p. 7). The history of this courtship occupies several pages, including a remarkable incident of Mr. Howard being treacherously and cruelly assaulted at Charlton by one Musgrove, the occupier of that estate during its sequestration, who mistook him for Sir Henry Newton, its Cavalier owner. At length Mr. Howard is sent away to France, but not until the lovers had mutually pledged their constancy (p. 13).

His absence did not lessen her mother's anger, and "for fourteen months she never gave me her blessing" (p. 14). Wearied with her bitterness, Anne Murray appealed to Sir Patrick Drummond, a cousin of her mother's, in order to procure admission to a Protestant nunnery in Holland (p. 15). Sir Patrick, "who was a wise and discreet gentleman," wrote such a "handsome serious" letter as reconciled the mother to her daughter, and she ever after treated her more as a friend than a child.

The next personage introduced into the narrative is Elizabeth Countess of Banbury, a sister of Lord Howard of Escrick. "My Lord Howard thought she was the fittest person to divert his son from his amour;" and the Countess, "who gloried much of her wit and contrivance," undertook the task to oblige her brother, and also (it is suggested) in order to induce him to further a projected marriage for her own son. On the 13th Feb. 1645-6, the Countess of Banbury arrived from France, bringing Mr. Howard with her. She had cajoled him to believe that she would forward his suit to Mistress Murray, but the result was that he shortly after formed an alliance with Lady Elizabeth Mordaunt, daughter of the Earl of Peterborough, which was privately solemnized in July 1646 (p. 18).

After her mother's death, Anne Murray was invited by her elder brother Charles and his lady to live with them, where she had an apartment for herself and her maid, and there stayed about a year. a

The next existing leaf of the narrative is lost, and we are abruptly introduced (p. 19) to Colonel Bamfield, a busy partisan of the royal family, who for some years after materially influenced the fortunes of the authoress. By his intervention she undertook a Life, 1701, p. 15.

to contribute to the escape of the Duke of York from St. James's Palace, where that prince was detained in the custody of the Earl of Northumberland. Lady Halkett gives a very interesting relation how she provided a female dress for the Duke of York's disguise, how she dressed him, and he "was very pretty in it," (p. 22), and then dispatched him with a Wood-street cake, which she knew he loved. After some difficulties the Duke was safely lodged in a ship at Gravesend, when the lady of Colonel Washington assisted in his concealment, and his escape to the continent was effected.

Our authoress has a good deal more to say of Colonel Bamfield, for she soon began to entertain an interest in him, not only on account of his zealous efforts for the King's service, but also for his personal qualities. At an early stage of their intercourse she ventured to take him to task (p. 19) that he had not seen his wife for a twelvemonth; but he excused himself with the explanation that his wife lived amongst her own friends, who had declared for the Parliament, and therefore, though kind to her, were not well disposed towards him, and that their separation was necessary from prudential reasons during the existing state of public discord.

Some time after the Duke of York's escape, a report arrived that the Colonel's wife was dead (p. 25), and it was not long before he made an offer of his hand to Mistress Anne Murray: alleging that, should it please God to restore the King, he had a promise to be one of his Majesty's bedchamber, and their joint fortunes would amount to 800l. per annum. His frequent urging of this suit at last prevailed, and she promised to marry him as soon as it might prove convenient. It was shortly before the "murder" of the King that they arrived at this understanding. After that event, on Mistress Murray one day visiting the Colonel, she found him oppressed with extraordinary melancholy (p. 26), and, when she inquired the cause, she learned it was because news had been brought him that his wife was still living! Unwilling to credit this report, he sent a trusty servant to ascertain the truth; who returned with an answer that her death had actually occurred at the time he heard of it, and that the messenger had seen her grave. Upon this, Anne Murray continued her former resolution to marry the Colonel, waiting only to take precautions against the sequestration of their property (p. 27).

About the same time her brother, Will Murray, came home from Court, much discontented. He had met with enemies among his associates, who accused him of keeping up a correspondence with Colonel Bamfield, in order to have the Duke of York crowned king in Scotland. Our author adds, that King Charles, though he did not believe the charge, was constrained to banish Will Murray from Court, sacrificing him to other persons whom he was afraid to offend. Landing at Gravesend, the discarded courtier was entertained at Cobham by the Duke and Duchess of Richmond; but almost immediately fell there into an illness from which he never recovered. An account of his deathbed, upon which he was attended by Dr. Wild, is given at some length (p. 29). He closed his life with the asseveration that, "Were I to live a thousand years, I would never set my foot in a Court again; for there is nothing in it but flattery and falsehood." It is afterwards mentioned that he was buried in the church of the Savoy, near his father and mother (p. 30).

After this sad occurrence, the author stayed for some time with her surviving brother, Charles Murray; but she was then prevailed upon to accept an invitation from Lady Howard to go home with her into the North. This lady was a daughter of Lord Howard of Escrick, and the same (to all appearance) whom our author first mentioned as the intimate friend of her early youth. Anne Howard had married her cousin Sir Charles Howard of Naworth Castle, afterwards the first Earl of Carlisle, a man of superior talents as well as station, and who seems to have been deservedly characterised as "one of the finest gentlemen."

It was on the 10th of September, 1649, that the party commenced their journey, in which nothing disagreeable occurred until they arrived at Hinderskelfe, beyond York, a house belonging to Sir Charles Howard, and which was then occupied by his sisters. Whilst there, both Sir Charles and his lady had a severe fit of sickness; and afterwards their son, then about three years old, was attacked by the small-pox. His cure was attributed to the treatment of "Sir Thomas Gore, who studied physic more for divertisement than gain;" and there can be little doubt that this was Sir Thomas Gower of Stittenham, a brother-in-law of Sir Charles Howard, and lineal ancestor of the Duke of Sutherland, for no regular physician or other person of that name is on record as having lived at that period.

With reviving health the travellers proceeded to Naworth Castle in Cumberland, and a very interesting account is given of the well-governed household which was then maintained there (p. 31). Amongst the rest, the highest praise is accorded to the chaplain, Mr. Nicolls, with whose personal conduct towards herself our memorialist had afterwards great cause to be offended.

Whilst thus living in peace and contentment, the post, which passed one day in the week, brought sad intelligence. Colonel Bamfield, who had been preparing to follow her to the North, had been arrested and committed to the Gatehouse at Westminster, where he lay in danger of his life. To add to her distress, she soon after received letters, both from her brother Murray and her sister Newton, declaring that they were convinced she had been deceived by Colonel Bamfield, for they were assured that his wife was still living, upon the authority of her uncle Sir Ralph S. a

Overcome by her feelings, Mistress Murray fell into a serious illness, in which she despaired of life (p. 32). She was unable to procure the attendance of a physician, but at length she was roused by Mrs. Culcheth, the wife of the house steward, to exert her own medical knowledge, which, "with the use of some cordialls," led to her recovery (p. 33).

Her prayers for Colonel Bamfield were soon after answered by the happy news that he had effected his escape from the Gatehouse, of the manner of which she gives a description (p. 34).

She next enters upon a detail of the treacherous method in which Mr. Nicolls, the chaplain at Naworth Castle, attempted to undermine her credit in the family. He asserted, on the suggested authority of Mr. Culcheth, the steward, that Lady Howard was jealous of Mistress Murray (p. 36), and he succeeded so far, by what he whispered in turn to either party, as to create a certain distrust and estrangement between the ladies. Mistress Murray was resolved to obtain an explanation, and she sought a private interview with Sir Charles Howard for that purpose (p. 38).

In the meantime, the Lady Howard had taken some objection to the chaplain's conduct towards two other young ladies who were resident in the family. They were sisters, "who had been bred up Papists, and by Sir Charles's example and care had become Protestants." The chaplain was employed for their instruction; but he was observed both by their waiting-woman and by Lady Howard herself to fondle the elder sister more kindly than was consistent with his usual gravity (p. 41). The circumstance of Lady Howard consulting our author on this delicate subject gave her an oppor-portunity to require an explanation of the grievance she herself experienced in the neglect of her old friend. This led to an éclaircissement, which proved, to the conviction of both the ladies, that the chaplain had acted a very double part (p. 45). At the same time it would seem that Mr. Nicolls fulfilled his joint functions of chaplain and secretary so usefully that he could not well be spared from the household at Naworth Castle.

Under these circumstances, Anne Murray determined to relinquish the hospitality of her old friends (p. 52). A letter from her sister Lady Newton communicated to her the fact that Sir Henry Newton, having accidentally met Colonel Bamfield on a passage to Flanders, had challenged him, and they fought soon after landing (p. 53). Their seconds were two colonels in the King’s army. The name of her brother Newton’s second she did not remember; but Bamfield’s second was Colonel Loe, who afterwards came into Scotland with the King.

Sir Henry Newton was wounded in the hand, and the combatants were then parted; Colonel Bamfield throughout the affair lamenting that the voice of honour summoned him to use his sword against the brother of one whom he loved beyond any living person.

Whilst in Flanders, Colonel Bamfield had an opportunity of conversing with the Earl of Dunfermline, and of representing to his lordship both the state of his own affairs and the position of his friend Mistress Murray. He interested that nobleman in the favour of both parties. Lord Dunfermline was one of the Commissioners sent to invite the King to Scotland, and he showed his regard towards our author by writing to her with an assurance that if she came to Scotland she would there find many friends willing to assist her in recovering that portion of her inheritance which was in Scotch hands (p. 54). “The Earl of Dunfermline’s concern in her was, that her mother had been educated in his father's family, and she, in duty and gratitude, had made his Lordship welcome to her house [in London] at all times when he came to Court."

Her friends Sir Charles and Lady Howard very kindly seconded her wishes to proceed to Scotland (p. 54). They supplied her with money, and Sir Charles appointed an old gentleman, a kinsman of his own, to attend her to Edinburgh. After two days' journey she arrived in that city on the 6th of June, 1650. She took up her lodging at Sanders Peers', at the foot of the Canongate, where the mistress of the house soon recognised her as a sister of the late Will Murray, for both [he and she] had noticed the resemblance which the landlady bore to their deceased mother. By this means she was immediately put into communication with her mother's executor (p. 56).

She had not long to wait before she received a welcome recognition from the most influential leaders of the Royalist party. One of the first was the Earl of Argyle, who, having paid her a visit, sent his own coach for her in order that she might be received by his lady and her daughter Lady Anne Campbell. Their demeanour at once dissipated some of the prejudices she had hitherto entertained against Scotland. The Lady Anne "was very handsome, extremely obliging, and her behaviour and dress were equal to any she had seen in the Court of England;" and, when introduced to the Countess, she at once perceived whence her daughter had derived both her beauty and her "civility" or courtly polish. The former was now under some decay, but the latter "was so evident and so well-proportioned, that while she gave to others she reserved what was due to herself" (p. 57).

Only a few days after, Mistress Murray received and accepted from Sir James Douglas, who was brother to the Countess of Dunferm-

line, an invitation to stay with him and his lady at Aberdour. On the 15th of June she crossed from Leith to Burntisland, and on her landing Sir James Douglas took her by one hand and the Laird of Maines by the other, and bid her welcome to Fife. At that moment she stumbled and fell flat on the ground. Amidst the mutual apologies of her cavaliers she exclaimed, "I thinke I am going to take possession of itt!" but she often looked back to this accident as a presage of the blessings she was afterwards to enjoy in Fife, for there she eventually found a husband and a home.

It is an interesting notice of the attention which was even then paid by Scotchmen to horticulture, that, when conducted through the garden at Aberdour, she found it so fragrant and delightful that she could imagine she was still in England.

Lady Halkett very briefly notices a journey she made into Morayshire in June 1652 (p. 71); and thus describes the preparations she made for returning to Edinburgh. After an affectionate leave-taking of her friends in Lord Dunfermline's family, and of Mr. George Sharpe, the minister of Fyvie, she left that place on the 24th June, 1652, in company with the Earl, his nephew Lord Lyon, and other gentlemen.

Having arrived at Edinburgh, she went first to her former lodgings in the Canongate, and then to others at the Nether Bow, where one night when writing a letter her privacy was violently invaded by a patrol of the English soldiers; but through the interference of William Murray of Hermiston, "who was very great with the English officers," she exacted an apology.

To avoid the like intrusions in future, she was very glad to accept of some rooms in the house of the Earl of Tweeddale, for which the Countess of Balcarres, with equal kindness, provided furniture (p. 75).

She was now able to prosecute her law business. She began a suit against the executors of Arthur Hay, who had been caution with the Earl of Kinnoull for a sum of £2,000 assigned to her by her late mother. The Lord Newbeth and his father gratuitously gave her their counsel.

At this time an accident made her acquainted with Sir James Halkett of Pitferran, her future husband. He was first brought to her lodging by the Earl of Dunfermline, on their way to the funeral of the lady of Sir John Gilmour.

It was on the [24th of June] that the King landed at [the mouth of the Spey].

When this important event became known to Mistress Murray, and she had reason to expect that his Majesty would soon turn his steps southwards, she began to fear what her reception might be, both on account of the disgrace of her late brother Will and of her own misfortune in the unhappy report that the wife of Colonel Bamfield was still alive. In order to feel her way she wrote to Mr. Henry Seymour, who was one of the grooms of the King's bedchamber, and had been a fellow-servant of her brother Charles. His answer, dated from Falkland on the 17th June, 1650 (and which is given in p. 58) assured her that the King gave no credit to the false rumours with which the world was then too full.

Soon after, accompanying Sir James Douglas, she repaired to the palace of Dunfermline, which they reached some three hours before the King's arrival (p. 59). In company with the Countess of Dunfermline and the Lady Anne Erskine she was introduced into the King's presence by the Marquess of Argyle and other persons of honour, and the ladies kissed his Majesty's hand. During the eight or ten subsequent days during which the King was entertained at Dunfermline those ladies daily attended upon him at dinner or supper; but Anne Murray was vexed that she obtained no special recognition from his Majesty. At last she solicited
Mr. Harding, one of the King's oldest servants, to remind him of her claims upon his notice; which the good old gentleman undertook to do; and the next day before Charles left the place he amended his manners by addressing to her a very gracious speech, in which he fully acknowledged the service she had performed in contributing to the Duke of York's escape (p. 60).

The reader is next reminded of the confident anticipations of success which the royal party entertained before the Battle of Dunbar, and the complete dash to its hopes by the triumph of Cromwell in that struggle.

There was no alternative to the Earl of Dunfermline and his friends but to retreat further north. The Countess kindly invited Mistress Murray to share her reduced fortunes, and on the 7th of September they left Dunfermline.

On their road to Kinross they passed many of the wounded soldiers who were still straggling from the late battle. Anne Murray was the Miss Nightingale of that time. She invited them to come to her to the Countess's lodging at Kinross, where during the next two days at least three score were attended by herself and her woman, with the assistance of a man—perhaps not actually a surgeon—named Ar. Ro. for those patients whose wounds were such as were unfit for her treatment.

On the Monday she continued her journey with the Countess of Dunfermline to St. Johnstoon or Perth, where the King and Court then were. There also they found the Countess of Kinnoull, Lady Argyle's sister, at whose house the Lord Lorne, the Marquess of Argyle's son, came, and told her, at first with some mystery, that her name had been frequently that day before the council. He presently explained that her good deeds to the wounded soldiers had been favourably reported, and that the King was pleased to give her thanks for her charity, at the same time recognising the necessity that hospitals and surgeons should be established in several towns, to which the wounded might resort.

On the 19th of September the Countess of Dunfermline, with the author in her company, left Perth, in order to proceed to Fyvie, her husband's castle in Aberdeenshire. The journey, during which two nights were passed at Brechin and four at Aberdeen, lasted to the 27th of the month (p. 64).

Some time after, the King came to Aberdeen, where, being presented by some of his loyal subjects with a purse of gold, he was pleased to assign fifty pieces to Mistress Murray, in performance of his promise to acknowledge her services to the wounded soldiers. This enabled her to repay 25l. which earlier in the year she had borrowed of Sir George S——.

While at Fyvie Mistress Murray received a letter from Colonel B[amfield], requesting permission to visit her. He came after some delay, and found her much weakened from another attack of illness. It was still a question whether his wife was living; but he was desirous to make the most solemn asseverations that he believed the contrary to be the fact. He stayed for two days.\(^a\)

She remained for nearly two years at Fyvie, in the greatest contentment, her most important occupation being the care of the sick and wounded persons, of whose cases she describes some of the most remarkable (p. 66).

When the King marched into England, the Earl of Dunfermline was one of the council left behind for the government of Scotland; but the ill-success of the royal forces at Worcester soon terminated this state of affairs. His lordship then retired from Edinburgh to Fyvie; and, when the army of the Parliament arrived at Aberdeen, he retired still further into Moray until he could arrange terms of capitulation.

\(^a\) Mr. Nichols had written "this was the last time that Anne Murray saw him." But see the next page.
Some of the English soldiers at length found their way to Fyvie, and spread terror in a household consisting chiefly of women and children. Mistress Murray was requested by the Countess of Dunfermline to parley with their leader, and she did so, as she tells us, with a successful result (p. 68).

Some time after, three entire regiments arrived at Fyvie Castle. They were commanded by Colonel Lilburne, Colonel Fitz, and Colonel Overton. The second of these, Colonel Fitz, was recognised by Mistress Murray as an old acquaintance at Naworth Castle. With Colonel Overton she had a remarkable conversation, very consistent with the known character of the man.

Shortly after, Mistress Murray determined to go to England and revisit her old friend Lady Howard at Naworth Castle. On her way she stayed two or three days with the Countess of Roxburgh at Fleurs, and afterwards met Colonel Bamfield by appointment at Alnwick. He dissuaded her from returning to Naworth, because there were some persons there she was not desirous to meet. Having sent her servant for the trunks she had left there, she returned to Edinburgh.

The lady of Sir Robert Moray, expecting to give birth to a child, desired some rooms in Lord Tweeddale’s house, and our author derived much pleasure from her society. Sir James Halkett, who was cousin-german to Sir Robert Moray, was at the same time a frequent visitor; and Anne Murray, divining his sentiments, sought an opportunity to disclose to him that she considered herself irrevocably engaged to Colonel Bamfield. Sir James Halkett received the disclosure with surprise, but at the same time with kindness, and was desirous to serve the colonel to the utmost of his power.

Colonel Bamfield now came to Edinburgh and joined a cabal of Royalists, who met every night in Lord Tweeddale’s house. Among those who came most frequently were the Earl of Dunfermline, Lord Balcarres, Sir James Halkett, and Sir George Mackenzie of Tarbet.
INTRODUCTION.

The Christmas of 1652 was attended by some ominous incidents. An English woman, who "kept a change" or ordinary, and had been a servant of Lady Balcarres, having, in accordance with the English custom, prepared a dish of minced pies, brought two of them as an offering, saying that one was intended for Sir Robert Moray and his wife, the other for Sir James Halkett and Mistress Murray. This raised a general smile, except on the face of Mistress Murray herself. However, all were extremely merry. But a woman named Jane Hamilton, reported to possess the gift of second sight, remarked, "There is a great deal of mirth in this house to-day, but before this day eight days there will be as much sadness." This was verified by the very painful death of Lady Moray, whose strength was not sufficient to give birth to her expected child.

On the 6th February, 1652-3, Colonel Bamfield took his leave, having arranged to go to the North of Scotland to raise a force for the King's reception. Jane Hamilton again uttered one of her prophecies, declaring that the Colonel would never become Anne Murray's husband.

Mistress Murray now left the Earl of Tweeddale's house for a lodging at the foot of Blackfriars Wynd; and soon after the Earl of Roxburgh, returning from London, brought from her sister an affectionate letter and the very acceptable present of 20l.

Sir James Halkett's attentions to her were persevering, but, from her previous engagement, unacceptable. To divert his attention she endeavoured to persuade him to marry, and even undertook to write to Lord Balcarres in order to forward his interest with a rich young widow. This suggests the introduction of an anecdote relative to the conduct of Sir James Halkett in the attack made upon Musselburgh. It appears that some reflections had been made upon his conduct on that occasion. Lord Balcarres relates that the King had been a witness of the whole affair from the leads of

Lord Balmerino's house at Leith, and had frequently given testimony to his good conduct (p. 84).

It was on the 21st of March, 1652-53, that Sir James Halkett was to go to Balcarres upon his matrimonial project; and that very day he heard from Colonel Hay that the wife of Colonel Bamfield was undoubtedly living. Just on the arrival of this overwhelming intelligence, another hiatus in the MS. occurs.

In May, 1653, the Earl of Dunfermline came to Mistress Murray, and, telling her that he had obtained information that measures would be taken to arrest the Earl of Balcarres upon the next day, requested her to undertake the task of warning that nobleman of his danger, as she was the only person he could trust. Upon this dangerous service she entered with her characteristic energy, and successfully accomplished it.

But the toil and excitement immediately brought on a serious illness, which kept her for some time at Balcarres. She could not have the aid of Dr. Cunningham, because he was gone with Lord Balcarres, and no other physician could be procured. She had frequent visits from ladies in the neighbourhood, particularly the Lady Ardross; and Mr. D. Forsyth and Mr. H. Rymer, apparently two ministers, paid her daily attention. On her recovery, after staying a week at the house of Lady Ardross, she returned to Edinburgh.

Sir James Halkett now urged his suit more warmly, but she declared that she was resolved not to marry at all (p. 89). However, she did not prohibit the continuance of his intercourse with her, and soon after she complied with his request that she would take charge of his two daughters. The younger was then but a child; but the elder near a woman, "and even then by more than ordinary discretion gave expectation of what she subsequently made good."
INTRODUCTION.

Upon this occasion Mistress Murray removed from the foot to the head of Blackfriars Wynd. She there resided with much content at one Mr. Glover's, Sir James Halkett coming often to see his children, and often bringing their uncle Sir Robert Montgomery and their cousin Haslehead.

Sir James Halkett again urged his suit, and summoned Mr. David Dickson, the minister of , to his aid. Mistress Murray unfolded her tale to that worthy man, "not doubting but that he would resolve the question upon her side of the argument; but, after listening with much attention and sympathy, he took the opposite view, telling her that not only was she released by what had occurred from any engagement she had made to Colonel Bamfield, but that she might even be guilty of a fault if she neglected the offer of Sir James Halkett (p. 92). At length, after further discussion, she gave a conditional promise to Sir James, dependent upon the settlement of her pecuniary affairs, and the assistance of her brother in that respect (p. 93).

Soon after, Sir James Halkett went to London to assist the Countess of Morton (then a widow) in some important business, and he returned to Mistress Murray with a kind message from her sister Lady Newton, and encouraging letters from others of her old friends.

This determined her to go to London herself, but she could not take her journey before the beginning of September 1654, when the old Countess of Dunfermline, having first taken her on a visit to Pinckie, provided her with the seasonable loan of ten pounds.

On the first night of her journey she rested at Cavers, the house of Sir James Halkett's sister. Sir James left his elder daughter there, (the younger being placed in a school at Edinburgh), and accompanied our traveller for one day longer. She then proceeded with her women, and a footman whom Sir James had promised to Lady
INTRODUCTION.

Newton. Of this footman she gives a remarkable account (p. 95). After riding for some days on horseback, she at last met the post-coach, in which she proceeded southwards. Its only occupants were Sir Widdrington and his nephew Mr. Errington, their man-servant, herself, and her woman. Though she was travelling under a borrowed name, her companions (who were Roman Catholics) discovered who she was, upon her mentioning the name of Mr. Fallowfield, an old priest that used sometimes to recommend sick persons to her care when at Naworth Castle (p. 96).

After arriving at Highgate one day at two in the afternoon, she sent the footman on to London, directing him to provide her a lodging, and bring a coach for her the next morning. She went to Whitesfriars, where her brother Newton's lodging used to be, and where she would enjoy some immunity if her London creditors were inclined to be troublesome. She then wrote to her sister, who was at that time at Warwick.

[Lady Halkett's creditors did not press hardly upon her. Her brother-in-law, Sir Henry Newton, lent her 300£. and the Countess of Devonshire lent her 200£. As soon as she had settled her affairs she was in a position to listen to Sir James's offers, and, after a day set "apart solemnly by fasting and prayer to beg God's direction in an affair of so great importance," she accepted him as her future husband. They were married on March 2, 1656, in her brother-in-law Newton's closet, by Mr. Gaile, chaplain to the Countess of Devonshire, whom they had brought from London to Charleton for that end. After a few days they took leave of their friends and set out for Scotland in the post-coach.

Sir James was a widower with two sons and two daughters, and he had also four children by this his second wife, all of whom "died" except Robert.
When the Restoration came, she had, like many others, pleas to urge for the repayment of money advanced to the Crown or spent in its interest. Like most others, she failed to obtain any satisfaction for her demands. "All she gained was to learn not to confide in anyone upon earth."

Her married life was a happy one. But her husband died in 1676; and she outlived him, a sorrowing widow, till 1699. She left behind her a large collection of devotional meditations, of which one upon the 25th Psalm was published at Edinburgh in 1778, together with a sketch of her life.]
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY

ANNE LADY HALKETT.
For my parents I need not say much, since they were well known, and I need not be ashamed to own them by *. It was mentioned as my reproach that I was of mean extraction; whereas he that now succeeds to that family * * was once, was as good a Gentleman as any. [For that matter] I shall ever be satisfied with what can [be said to] the advantage of that family; but some that [I am akin] to, both by father and mother, would take it ill not [to be] thought Gentlemen, for my father claimed the honor of being derived from the Earl of Tillibardin's family, and my mother from the Earl of Perth's.

Hee was thought a wise King who made choice of my father to bee tutor to the late King of blessed memory; and what that excellent Prince learnt in his youth kept him Stedfast in his religion, though under all the temptations of Spaine, Temperate in all the excesses that attend a Court, Vertuous and Constant to the only lawfull embraces of the Queene, and unmoveable and undisturbed under all his unparallel'd sufferings. For a recompense to my father's care in discharging his duty, hee was made Provost of Eaton Col-ledge; where hee staid not long, but died when I was but three months old,—yet it seems the short time he lived amongst those prebends they were so well satisfied, both with him and my mother, that after my father's death they petitioned to have his place continued to my mother a yeare, which was never before granted to any woman; and during her time they all renewed their leases, as a testimony of their respect and desire to give her that advantage.

As this may evidence what my father's partes were, so my mother may be best knoune by beeing thought fitt, both by the late King and Queenes Majesty, to be entrusted twice with the charge and honor of beeing Governese to the Duke of Glocester and the Princese Elizabeth; the first during the time that the Countese of Roxbery (who owned my mother for her cousin) went and continued in Holland with the Princese Royall; and then again when my Lady Roxbery died. The first was only by a verball order; butt the last was under the signett, dated (blank), wch I have by mee to produce if itt were nesesary.

By this short account I have given of my parents it will be seen what trust the greatest thought them cap[able of], wherfore they could not butt performe a duty to [their children], butt that care was wholy left (next to God's providence) to my mother,—my father dying when wee were all very young,—who spared noe expence in educating all her children in the most suitable way to improve them, and if I made not the advantage I might have done it was my own fault, and not my mother's, who paid masters for teaching my sister and mee to write, speake French, play on the lute and virginalls, and dance, and kept a gentlewoman to teach us all kinds of needleworke, which shews I was not brought up in an idle life. But my mother's greatest care, and for which I shall ever owne to her memory the highest gratitude, was the great care she tooke that, even from our infancy, wee were instructed never to neglect to begin and end the day with prayer, and orderly every morning to read the Bible, and ever to keepe the church as offten as there was occation to meet there, either for prayers or preaching. So that for many yeares together I was seldom or never absent from divine service, at five a’ clocke in the morning in the summer, and sixe a’ clocke in the winter, till the usurped power putt a restraint to that puplicke worship so long owned and continued in the Church of England; where, I blese God, I had my education, and the example of a good Mother, who kept constantt to her owne parish church, and had allways a great respect for the ministers under whose charge shee was.

What my childish actions were I thinke I need not give accounttt of here, for I hope none will thinke they could bee either vicious or scandalous. And from that time till the year 1644 I may truly say all my converse was so innocent that my owne hart cannott challenge mee with any imodesty, either in thought or behavior, or an act of disobedience to my mother, to whom I was so observant that as long as shee lived I doe nott remember that I made a visitt to ye neerest neibour or wentt anywhere withoutt her liberty. And so scrupulous I was of giving any occation to speake of mee, as I know they did of others, that though I loved well to see plays and to walke in the Spring Garden sometimes (before itt grew something scandalous by ye abuse of some), yett I cannott remember 3 times that ever I wentt with any man besides my brothers; and if I did, my sisters or others better than my selfe was with mee.
And I was the first that proposed and practised itt, for 3 or 4 of us going together withoutt any man, and every one paying for themselves by giving the mony to the footman who waited on us, and he gave itt in the play-howse. And this I did first upon hearing some gentlemen telling what ladys they had waited on to plays, and how much itt had cost them; upon which I resolved none should say the same of mee.

In the yeare 1644 I confese I was guilty of an act of disobedience, for I gave way to ye adrese of a person whom my mother, att the first time that ever hee had occation to bee conversantt w^h mee, had absolutely discharged mee ever to allow of: And though before ever I saw him severalls did tell mee that there would bee something more than ordinary betwixt him and mee (w^h I believe they fudged from the great friendship betwixt his sister and mee, for wee were seldom assunder att London, and shee and I were bedfellows when shee came to my sister's house att Charleton, where for ye most part shee staid while wee continued in the country,) yett he was halfe a yeare in my company before I discovered anything of a particular inclination for mee more than another; and, as I was civill to him both for his owne merit and his sister sake, so any particular civility I received from him I looked upon it as flowing from the affection hee had to his sister, and her kindness to mee. After that time, itt seemes hee was nott so much master of himselfe as to conceale itt any longer. And having never any oportunity of being alone with mee to speake himselfe, hee imployed a young gentleman (whose confidentt he was in an amour betwixt him and my Lady Anne his cousin-german,) to tell mee how much hee had indeavored all this time to smother his passion, which he said began the first time that ever hee saw mee, and now was come to that height that if I did nott give him some hopes of favor he was resolved to goe back againe into France (from whence he had come when I first saw him) and turn Capucin. Though this discourse disturbed mee, yett I was a weeke or ten days before I would be persuaded so much as to heare him speake of this subject, and desired his friend to represent severall disadvantages that itt would bee to him to pursue such a designe. And, knowing that his father had sentt for him outt of France with an intention to marry him to sum rich match that might improve his fortune, itt would be high ingratitude in mee to doe anything to hinder such a designe, since his father had beene so obliging to my mother and sister as to use his Lord's interest with ye Parliamentt to preventt the ruine of my brother's howse and k[in?] ; butt when all I could say to him by his friend could not prevaile, butt that hee grewe so ill and discontented that all the howse tooke notice, I did yield so farre to comply with his desire as to give him liberty one day when I was walking in ye gallery to come there and speake to mee. What he saide was handsome and short, butt much disordered, for hee looked pale as death, and his hande trembled when he tooke mine to lead mee, and with a great sigh said, "If I loved you lesse I could say more." I told him I could not but thinke myselfe much obleege to him for his good opinion of mee, but it would be a higher obligation to confirme his esteeeme of mee by following my advice, which I should now give him my selfe, since hee would not receive itt by his friend. I used many argumentes to disuade him from pursuing what hee proposed. And, in conclusion, told him I was 2 or 3 yeare older than hee, and were there no other objection, yett that was of such weight with mee as would never lett mee allow his further adrese. "Madam, (said he,) what I love in you may well increase, but I am sure itt can never decay." I left arguing, and told him I would advise him to consult with his owne reason, and that would lett him see I had more respect to him in denying than in granting what with so much passion he desired.

After that hee sought, and I shunned, all opportunitys of private discourse with him; but one day, in ye garden, his friend tooke his sister by the hand and lead her into another walke, and left him and I together: and hee, with very much seriousnese, began to tell mee that hee had observed ever since hee had discovered his affection to mee that I was more reserved and avoided all converse with him, and therefore, since hee had no hopes of my favor, hee was resolved to leave England, since he could not bee happy in itt. And that what ever became of him y^t might make him displease either his father or his friends I was the occasition of it, for if I would not give him hopes of marryng him hee was resolved to putt him selfe out of a capacity of marryng any other, and go imediately into a conventt. And that he had taken order to have post horses ready against the next day. I confesse this discourse disturbed mee, for though I had had noe respect for him, his sister, or his family, yett religion was a tye upon mee to endeaver the prevention of the hazard of his soule. I looked on this as a violent passion w^th would nott last long, and perhaps might grow the more by beeing resisted, when as a seeming complaisance might lessen it. I told him I was sorry to have him entertain such thoughts as could not but bee a ruine to him and a great affliction to all his relations, wch I would willingly preventt if itt were in my power. He said itt was absolutely in my power, for if I would promise to marry him hee should esteeme himselfe the most haply man living, and hee would waite what ever time I thought most convenientt for itt. I replied I thought it was unreasonable to urge mee to promise that wch ere long hee might repentt the asking; butt this I would promise to satisfy him, that I would not marry till I saw him first maried. Hee kist my hand upon that with as much joy as if I had confirmed to him his greatest hapinesse, and said hee could desire noe more, for hee was secure I should never see nor heare of that till itt was to my selfe. Upon this wee parted both well pleased, for hee thought hee had gained much in what I promised, and I looked upon my promise as a cure to him, butt noe inconvenience to myself, since I had noe inclination to marry any. And though I had, a delay in itt was the least returne I could make to see deserving a person. Butt I deceaved myselfe by thinking this was the way to moderate his passion, for now hee gave way to itt without any restraintt, and thought himselfe noe secure of mee as if there had beene nothing to oppose itt, though hee managed itt with that discretion that it was scarce visible to any within the howse; nott so much as either his sister or mine had the least suspition of it, for I had injoyned him not to lett ym or any other know what his designes were, because I would not have them accesory, what ever fault might bee in the prosecution of itt. Thus it continued till towards winter that his sister was to goe home to her father againe, and then, knowing hee would want much of the oportunity hee had to converse with mee, hee was then very importunate to have mee consent to marry him privately, wch itt seemes hee pleased himselfe so with the hopes of prevailing with mee that he had provided a wedding ring and a minister to marry us. I was much unsattisfied with his going that length, and, in short, told him hee need never expect I would marry him without his father and my mother's consent; if that could be obtained, I should willingly give him the satisfaction hee desired, but without that I could not expect God's blessing neither upon him nor mee, and I would doe nothing that was so certain a way to bring ruine upon us both. Hee used many arguments from ye examples of others who had practised the same, and was happy both in their parents' favor and in one another, but finding mee fixt beyond any persuasion, hee resolved to acquaintt my sister with itt, and to imploy her to speake of itt to his father and my mother. Shee very unwillingly undertooke it, because shee knew itt would be a surprise to them, and very unwelcome. Butt his impertunity prevailed, and shee first acquainted my mother with itt; who was so passionately offended with the proposall ye, whereas his father might have beene brought to have given his consentt (having ever had a good opinion of mee and very civill), shee did so exasperate him against itt, that nothing could satisfy her but presently to putt itt to Mr. H.'s choice either presently to marry a rich cittisen's daughter that his father had designed for him, or els to leave England.

The reason I believe ye made my mother the more incensed was, first that itt was what in ye beginning of our acquaintance shee had absolutely discharged my having a thought of allowing such an adrese; and though in some respect his quality was above mine, and therefore better then any shee could expect for mee, yett my Lord H.'s fortune was such as had need of a more considerable portion then my mother could give mee, or els it must ruine his younger childdren, and therefore my mother would not consentt to itt, though my Lord H. did offer to doe the uttmost his condition would allow him if shee would lett me take my hazard with his son. Butt my mother would nott bee persuaded to itt upon noe consideration, lest any should have thought itt was begun with her allowance; and to take away ye suspition of that did, I believe, make her the more violent in oposing itt, and the more seavere to mee. My sister made choice of Sunday to speake of itt. First, because shee thought that day might putt ye both in a calmer frame to heare her, and confine there passion, since it would bee the next day before they would determine anything. Butt finding both by my mother and my L. H. that they intended nothing butt to part us, so as never to meet againe, except it was as strangers, Mr. H. was very importunate to have an opertunity to speake with mee that night, w\(^{th}\) I gave. My sister beeing only with mee, we came downe together to y\(^{e}\) roome I apointed to meett with him. I confess I never saw those two pasions of love and regret more truly represented, nor could any person expresse greater affection and resolution of constancy, w\(^{th}\) with many solemne oaths hee sealed of never loving or marrying any butt my selfe. I was not sattisfied with his swearing to future performances, since I said both hee and I might find itt most convenient to retract; but this I did assure him, as long as hee was constantt hee should never find a change in mee, for though duty did obliege mee nott to marry any withoutt my mother's consentt, yett itt would nott tye mee to marry withoutt my owne. My sister at this rises, and said, "I did nott thinke you would have ingaged me to be a witnesse of both your resolutions to continue what I expected you would rather have laid aside, and therefore I will leave you." "Oh, madam, (said hec,) can you imagine I love att that rate as to have itt shaken with any storme? Noe; were I secure your sister would not suffer in my absence by her mother's sevairity I would nott care what misery I were exposed to; butt to thinke I should bee y\(^{e}\) occation of trouble to the person in y\(^{e}\) earth that I love most is unsuportable;" and with that hee fell downe in a chaire that was behind him, but as one withoutt all sence, w\(^{th}\) I must confess did so much move mee, y\(^{t}\) laing aside all former distance I had kept him att, I sat downe upon his knee, and laying my head neare his I suffred him to kisse mee, w\(^{th}\) was a liberty I never gave before, nor had nott then had I nott scene him so overcome with griefe, w\(^{th}\) I endeavered to supprese with all y\(^{e}\) encouragement I could, butt still presing him to be obedientt to his father, either in going abroad or staying att home, as hee thought most convenient. "Noe, (says he,) since they will not allow mee to converse with you, France will bee more agreeable to mee then England, nor will I goe there except I have liberty to come here againe and take my leave of you." To that I could not disagree if they thought fitt to allow itt; and so my sister and I left him, butt she durst nott owne to my mother where shee had bee.

The next morning early my Lord H. went away, and tooke with him his son and daughter, and left me to the seaveritys of my offended mother, who nothing could pacify. Afler she had called for me, and said as many bitter things as passion could dictate upon such a subject, shee discharged mee to see him, and did solemnly vow that if shee should heare I did see Mr. H. shee would turne mee outt of her doores, and never owne mee againe. All I said to that part was that itt should be against my will if ever shee heard of itt. Upon Tuesday my Lord H. writt to my mother that hee had determined to send his son to France, and that upon Thursday after hee was to begin his journy; butt all he desired before hee wentt was to have liberty to see mee, wch he thought was a sattisfaction could nott bee denied him, and therefore desired my mother's consentt to itt; wch shee gave upon the condition that hee should only come in and take his leave of mee, butt nott to have any converse but what shee should bee a witnese of her selfe. This would nott att all please Mr. H., and therefor seemed to lay the desire of itt aside. In the meane time my chamber and liberty of lying alone was taken from mee, and my sister's woman was to bee my guardian, who watched sufficiently so that I had not the least opertunity either day or night to bee without her. Upon Thursday morning early my mother sentt a man of my sister's (whose name I must mention with ye rest that att that [time] was in the familly, for there was Moses, Aron, and Miriam all at one time in itt, and none either related or acquainted together till they mett there)—this Moses was sent to my Lord H. with a letter to inquire if his son were gone. I must here relate a little odd incounter wch agravated my misfortune. There came no returne till night, and having gott liberty to walke in the hall my mother sent a child of my sister’s and bid him walke with mee, and keepe mee company. I had not beene there a quarter of an hower butt my maid Miriam came to mee and told mee she was walkeing at the backe gate and Mr. H. came to her and sentt her to desire mee to come there and speake butt two or three words with him, for hee had sworne nott to goe away without seeing mee, nor would hee come in to see my mother, for he had left London that morning very early and had rod up and downe that part of the country only till itt was ye gloome of ye evening to have the more privacy in conning to see mee. I bid her goe back and tell him I durst not see him because of my mother’s oath and her discharge. While shee was presing me to run to the gate, and I was neere to take the start, the child cried outt, “O, my aunt is going;” wch stoped me, and I sent her away to tell ye reason why I could nott come. I still staid walking in the hall till shee returned, wondering she staid so long. When shee came, shee was hardly able to speake, and with great disorder said, “I believe you are ye most unfortunate person living, for I thinke Mr. H. is killed.” Any one that hath ever knowne what gratitute was, may imagine how these words disordered me; butt, impatientt to know how (I was resolved to hazard my mother’s displeasure rather then nott see him), shee told me that while shee was telling him my answeare there came a fellow with a great club behind him and strucke him downe dead, and others had seized upon Mr. T. (who formerly had seen his governor, and was now intrusted to see him safe on ship boord,) and his man. The reason of this was from what there was too many sad examples of att that time when the devison was betwixt ye King and Parliamentt, for to betray a master or a friend was looked upon as doing God good service. My brother-in-law Sr Henry Newton had beene long from home in attendance on the King, for whose service hee had raised a troope of horse upon his owne expence, and had upon all occasions testified his loyalty, for wch all his estate was sequestred, and with much difficulty my sister gott liberty to live in her owne house, and had the fifth part to live upon, wth was obtained with impertunity. There was one of my brother's tenants called Musgrove, who was a very great rouge, who farmed my brother's land of ye Parliament, and was imployed by them as a spy to discover any of the Cavaliers that should come within his knowledge: hee, observing 3 gentlemen upon good horse scoutting about all day and keeping att a distance from the high way, apprehends itt was my brother who had come privately home to see my sister, and resolves to watch when hee came neere ye house, and had followed so close as to come behind and give Mr. H. that stroake, thinking itt had beene my brother Newton, and seased upon his governuer and servantt (the post boy being left att some distance with the horses). In the midst of this disorder Moses came there, and Miriam having told what the occation of itt was, hee told Musgrove itt was my Lord H. son hee had used so; upon which hee and his complices wentt imediately away, and Moses and Mr. H.'s man caried him into an alehouse hard by and laid him on a bed, where hee lay some time before hee came to himselfe. So, hearing all was quiett againe, and that hee had noe hurt, only stonished with the blow, I wentt into ye roome where I had left my mother and sister, wth being att a good distance from the backe gate they had heard nothing of the tumult yt had been there. A little after Moses came in and delivered a letter from my Lord Howard, wth after my mother had read, she asked what news att London. Hec answeread, the greatest hee could tell was that Mr. H. wentt away that morning early post to Deepe, and was going to France, butt hee could nott learne the reason of it. My mother and sister seemed to wonder att itt, for none in the familly except my maid knew any thing that had fallen outt, or had any suspition I was concerned in itt, but my mother and sister. After Moses went out my mother asked mee if I was nott ashamed to thinke that it would be said my Lord H. was forced to send away his son to secure him from mee. I said I could nott regrett whatever had occasioned her displeasure or his punishment, but I was guilty of no unhandsome action to make mee ashamed, and therefore, whatever were my present misfortune, I was confidentt to evidence before I died that noe child shee had had greater love and respect to her or more obedience; to w^e shee replied, It seems you have a good opinion of yourselfe.

My mother now beleewing Mr. H. gone, I was nottt as former nights sentt to my bed and ye guard upon mee that was usuall, butt I staid in my mother's chamber till shee and my sister (who lay together) was a'bed. In the meane time Mr. H. had sentt for Moses and told him what ever misfortune he might suffer by his stay there hee was fully determined nottt to goe away without seeing mee, and desired I would come to the banketting howse in ye garden and hee would come to ye window and speake to mee; w^e he told mee, and with all that Mr. T. (who was a very serious good man) did earnestly intreat mee to condescend to his desire to preventt what might be more inconvenientt to us both. I sent him word when my mother was a'bed I would contrive some way to sattisfy him, buttt nottt where hee proposed, because it was within the view of my mother's chamber window. After I had left my mother and sister in there bed I wentt alone in the darke through my brother's closett to ye chamber where I lay, and as I entered the roome I laid my hand upon my eyes, and with a sad sigh said, Was ever creature so unfortunate and putt to such a sad deficulty, either to make Mr. H. forsworne if hee see mee nottt, or if I doe see him my mother will bee foresworne if shee doth nottt expose mee to the utmost rigour her anger can inventt! In the midst of this dispute with myselfe what I should doe, my hand being still upon my eyes, itt presently came in my mind that if I blindfolded my eyes that would secure mee from seeing him, and so I did nott transgresse against my mother, and hee might that way satisfy himselfe by speaking with mee. I had as much joy in finding out this means to yeeld to him withoutt disquiett to my selfe as if itt had beene of more considerable consequence. Imediately I sentt Moses to tell him upon what conditions I would speake with him; first, that hee must allow mee to have my eyes covered, and that hee should bring Mr. T. with him, and if thus hee were sattisfied I ordered him to bring them in the backe way into ye cellar, where I with Miriam would meett them the other way; wch they did. As soon as Mr. H. saw mee hee much importuned the taking away the covert from my eyes; wch I not suffering, hee left disputing that, to employ the litle time hee had in regretting my nott yielding to his importunity to marry him before his aflication was discovered to his father and my mother, for had itt beene once past there power to undoe, they would [have] beene sooner sattisfied, and wee might have been happy together and not indured this sad separation. I told him I was sorry for beeing the occation of his discontentt, butt I could nott repentt the doing my duty what ever ill successe itt had, for I ever looked upon marying without consentt of parentts as the highest act of ingratitude and disobedience that children could committ, and I resolved never to bee guilty of itt. I found his greatest trouble was the feare hee had that my mother in his absence would force me to marry M. L. (who was a gentleman of a good fortune who some people thought had a respect for mee). To this I gave him as much assurance as I could that neither hee nor any other person liveing should lessen his interest till hee gave mee reason for itt himselfe. Itt is unnecesary to repeatt the solemne oaths hee made never to love nor marry any other, for, as I did nott approve of itt then, so I will nott now agravate his crime by mentioning them. Butt there was nothing he left unsaid that could expresse a sincere affection and true affection. Mr. T. (who with Moses and Miriam had all this time beene so civill to us both as to retire att such a distance as nott to heare what wee said,) came and interupted him, and desired him to take his leave, lest longer stay might be prejudicial all to us all. I called for a botlle of wine, and giving Mr. T. thankes for his civility and care, drunk to him, wishing a good and happy journey to Mr. H. So taking a farewell* of them both, I wentt up the way I came, and left them to Moses' care to conduct them outt quietly as hee led them in.

* This was upon Thursday night ye 10th of October, 1644.
This was not so secretely done butt some of ye howse observed more noise than ordinarily used to bee att ye time of night, and by sattisfying there curiosity in looking outt discovred the occation of itt; butt they were all so just as none of them ever aquainted my mother with itt, though I did not concel itt from my sister the first opertunity I had to bee alone with her. I was in hopes, after some time that Mr. H. was gone, my mother would have receaved mee into her faver againe, butt ye longer time shee had to consider of my fault the more shee did agravate itt. And though my Lord H. (who returned shortly after with his daughter) and my sister did use all the arguments imaginable to persuade her to bee reconciled to mee, yet nothing would prevale, except I would solemnly promise never to thinke more of Mr. H. and ye I would marry another whom shee thought fitt to propose; to whch I beged her pardon, for till Mr. H. was first maried I was fully determined to marry noe person living. Shee asked mee if I was such a foole as to believe he would be constantt. I said I did; but if he were nott, itt should bee his fault, nott mine, for I resolved nott to make him guilty by example. Many were employed to speake to mee. Some used good words, some ill; butt one that was most seavare, after I had heard her with much patience raile a long time, when she could say noe more I gave a true accountt how innocentt I was from having any design upon Mr. H. and related what I have allready mentioned of the progresse of his affection; which when she heard, shee sadly wept and beged my pardon, and promised to doe mee all the service shee could; and I beleve shee did, for shee had much influence upon my Lord H. (having beeene with his lady from a child), and did give so good a character of mee and my procedings in that afaire with his son, that shee againe made an offer to my mother to send for his son if shee would consentt to the mariage; butt shee would nott heare itt spoken of, butt said shee rather I were buried than bring so much ruine to the familley shee honored. My mother's anger against mee increased to that height, that for fourteene moneths shee never gave me her blesing, nor never spoke to mee but when itt was to reproach mee; and one day said with much bitterness she did hate to see mee. That word, I conge, strucke deepely to my hart, and putt mee to my thoughts what way to dispose of myselfe to free my mother from such an object. Aafter many debates with my selfe, and inquirys what life I could take to that was most innocent, I resolved and writt to Sr Patrick Drumond, a cousin of my mother's, who was Conservator in Holland, to doe mee the favor to informe mee if itt was true that I had heard that there was a nunery in Holland for those of the Protestant religion, and that hee would inquiere upon what conditions they admitted any to there society, because if they were consistent with my religion I did resolve upon his advertisement imediately to goe over; and desired him to hasten an answeare, and not devulge to any what I had writt to him. About a fortnight after my mother sent for mee one morning into her chamber, and examined mee what I had writt to Sr Patrick Drumond. I ingeniously gave her an accountt, and ye reason of itt, for since I found nothing would please her that I could doe I was resolved to goe where I could most please my selfe, wch was in a solitary retired life, and so free her from the sight shee hated, and since itt was upon that consideration I did not doubt the obtaining her consent.
It seems Sr Patrick Drumond, who was a wise and honest gentleman, apprehending discontentt had made mee take that resolution wch I had writt to him about, instead of answering my letter, writt to my mother a very handsome serious letter, aquainting her with my intention, and concluded itt could proceed from nothing but her scavarity, perhaps upon unjust grounds, and therefore used many arguments to persuade her to returne to that wonted kindnese wch shee had ever shewed to all her children, and what shee was sure I would deserve, what ever opinion shee had lately entertained to ye contrary. This hee pressed with so much of reason and earnestnese that itt prevailed more with my mother than what ever had beene said before, and from that time she receaved mee againe to her faver, and ever aafter used me more like a freind than a child. In the meane time all care was used that might preventt Mr H. corespondence and mine. Butt he found an excuse for sending home his man, beleeving him honest and faithfull to him, and with him hee writt and sentt me a presentt, butt instead of delivering them to mee gave them to his father, who otherwise disposed of them. Yett in requitall I sent backe with him a ring with five rubys, and gave him something for his paines, when hee came to me and indeavoured to vindicate himselfe by protesting yt unexpectedly hee was searched as soone as ever hee entred his lord's house, and all was taken from him; butt I found afterwards hee was nott so honest as I beleeved, for hee never delivered my ring to his master, nor anything I intrusted him with.

Att this time my Lord H. had a sister in France, who gloried much of her witt and contrivance, and used to say shee never designed anything butt shee accomplished it. My Lord H. thought she was ye fittest person to divert his son from his amour, and to her hee writtes, and recommends itt to her management; who was nott neglegent of what shee was intrusted with, as appeared in the conclusion, though her cariage was a great disappointment to Mr H., for hee expected by her mediation to have obtained what he desired, and that made him the more willing to comply with her, who designed her own advantage by this to obliege her brother, who might bee the more usefull to her in a projected marriage shee had for her owne son.

Upon Thursday ye 13. of February 1645-6, word was brought to my mother that ye Countese of B. was come outt of France, and Mr. H. with her, w^th was a great surprise to her and all his relations. My mother examined mee if I had sentt for him, or knew any thing of his comning; w^th I assured her I had nott, and shee said nott much more. Butt I was as much disturbed as any, sometimes thinking hee was come with an assurance from his auntt that shee would accomplish what he had so passionately desired, or els that hee had laid all thoughts of mee aside, and was come with a resolution to comply with his father's desires. The last opinion I was a litle confirmed in, having never receaved any word or letter from him in ten days after his returne, and meeting him accidentally where I was walking hee crossed the way, and another time was in the roome when I came in to visit some young ladys, and neither of these times tooke any notice of mee more then of one I had never seene. I confesse I was a little disordered att itt, butt made noe conclusions till I saw what time would produce.

Upon Tuesday the 4. of March, my Lady Anne W. his cousin came to my mother's, and having staid a convenient time for a visit with my mother (for then itt was nott usuall for mothers and daughters to bee visited apart) I waited on her downe, and taking mee aside, shee told mee shee was desired by her cousin T. H. to presentt his most faithfull service to mee, and to desire mee nott to take itt ill that hee did nott speake to me when hee mett mee, for finding his auntt nott his friend as he expected hee seemed to comply with her desire only to have the opertunity of comming home wth her, and had resolved for a time to forbeare all converse with mee, and to make love to all that came in his way, butt assured mee itt was only to make his friends think hee had forgott mee, and then hee might with ye lese suspition prosecute his designe, wch was never to love or marry any butt mee, and this shee said hee confirmed with all the solemne oaths imaginable. In pursuance of this he visited all the young ladys about the towne, butt an Earles daughter gave him the most particular wellcome, whose mother not allowing him to come as a pretender shee made apointmentt with him and mett him att her cousin's howse frequently, wch I knew, and hee made sport of. The summer being now advancing, my mother and her familly wentt with my sister to her house in the country; wch beeing nott farre from London, wee heard offten how afares wentt there, and amongst other discourse that it was reported Mr. H. was in love with my Lady E. M. and shee with him, att wch some smiled and said itt might bee her witt had taken him butt certainly nott her beauty (for shee had as litle of that as my selfe). Though these reports putt mee upon my guard yett I confesse I did not beleve hee was reall in his adresse there, neither did his sister, who was sometimes a wittnese of there converse and gave mee accountt of itt; butt I aproved nott of his way, for I thought itt could nott butt reflect upon him selfe, and injure either that lady or mee. Butt shee tooke a way to secure her selfe; for upon the last Tuesday in July 1646, a little before super, I receved a letter from Mrs. H., a particular friend of mine, who writt mee word that upon ye Tuesday before Mr. H. was privately maried to my Lady E. M., and the relations of both sides was unsattified.

I was alone in my sister's chamber when I read the letter, and flinging my selfe downe upon her bed, I said, "Is this the man for whom I have sufred so much? Since hee hath made him selfe unworthy my love, hee is unworthy my anger or concerne;" and rising imediately I wentt outt into the next roome to my super as unconcernedly as if I had never had an interest in him, nor had never lost itt. A litle affter my mother came to the knowledge of itt from my Lord H., who was much discontented att his son's mariage, and offten wished hee had had his former choice. Nothing troubled mee more than my mother's laughing att mee, and perhaps soe did others, butt all I said was, "I thought hee had injured himself more than mee, and I much rather hee had done ittt then I;" and once, I confese, in passion, being provoked by something I had heard, I said with too much seriousnese, "I pray God hee may never dye in peace till hee confese his fault, and aske mee forgive-nese." Butt I acknowledge this as a fault, and have a hundred times beged the Lord's pardon for itt; for, though in some respects itt might bee justified as wishing him repentance, yett many circumstancies might make itt imposible for mee to be a wittnese of itt. And God forbid that any should wantt peace for my passion! When Miriam first heard hee was maried shee lifted up her hands and said, "Give her, O Lord, dry breasts, and a miscarrying wombe!" which I reproved her for; butt itt seemes the Lord thought fitt to grantt her request, for that lady miscaried of severall children before shee brought one to the full time, and that one died presently after itt was borne, wth may be a lesson to teach people to governe there wishes and there young, that neither may act to the prejudice of any, lest itt bee placed on there accountt att the day of reckoning. Nott only was this couple unfortunate in the children, butt in one another, for itt was too well knowne how short a time continued the sattisfaction they had in one another.
Nor did his aunt the Countese of Banbery, who first putt him upon time and nott the worse that hee professe to have a great friendship for my brother Will.

This gentleman came to see mee sometimes in the company of lady's who had beene my mother's neibours in St Martin's Lane, and sometimes alone, butt when ever hee came his discourse was serious, handsome, and tending to imprese the advantages of piety, loyalty, and vertue; and these subjects were so agreeable to my owne inclination that I could nott butt give them a good reception, especially from one that seemed to bee so much an owner of them himselfe. After I had beene used to freedom of discourse with him I told him I approued much of his advise to others, butt I thought his owne practise contradicted much of his proffesion, for one of his aquaintance had told mee hee had nott scene his wife in a twelvemonth, and itt was impossible, in my opinion, for a good man to bee an ill husband; and therefore hee must defend himselfe from one before I could beleive the other of him. Hee said itt was not nesesary to give every one that might condemne him the reason of his being so long from her, yett to sattisfy mee hee would tell mee the truth, wth was, that hee beinge engaged in the King's service he was oblieged to bee att London, where itt was nott convenientt for her to bee with him, his stay in any place beeinge uncertaine; besides, shee lived amongst her freinds, who, though they were kind to her, yett were nott so to him, for most of that country had declared for the Parleament, and were enimys to all that had or did serve the King, and therefore his wife, hee was sure, would not condemne him for what hee did by her owne consentt. This seeming reasonable, I did insist noe more upon that subject.
At this time hee had frequentt letters from ye King, who im-ployed him in severall affairs, butt that of the greatest concerne wch hee was employed in was to contrive the Duke of Yorke's escape out of St James (where his Highnese and the Duke of Glocester and the Princese Elizabeth lived under the care of ye Earle of Northumberland and his lady). The difficultys of itt was represented by Coll. B.; but his Maie still pressed itt, and I remember this expresion was in one of the letters:—"I beleeve itt will bee deficult, and if hee miscary in the attempt itt will bee ye greatest affliction that can arive to mee; butt I looke upon James's escape as Charles's preservation, and nothing can content mee more; therfore bee carefull what you doe."

This letter, amongst others, hee showed mee, and where the King aprove of his choice of mee to intrust with itt, for to gett the Duke's cloaths made, and to dresse him in his disguise. So now all C. B.'s busynese and care was how to manage this busynese of so importtant concerne, wch could not bee performed without several persons' concurrence in itt, for hee beeing generally knowne as one whose stay att London was in order to serve the King, few of those who were intrusted by the Parliament in puplicke concernes durst owne converse or hardly civility to him, lest they should have beene suspect by there party, wch made itt defict for him to gett acces to ye Duke; but (to be short) having comunicated ye designe to a gentleman attending his Highnese, who was full of honor and fidelity, by his meanes hee had private acces to the Duke, to whom hee presented the King's letter and order to his Highnese for consenting to act what C. B. should contrive for his escape, wch was so cheerfully intertained and so readily obayed, that being once designed there was nothing more to doe than to prepare all things for the execution. I had desired him to take a ribban with him and bring mee the bignese of the Duke's wast and his lengh, to have cloaths made fitt for him. In the meane time C. B. was to provide mony for all nesesary expence, wch was furnished by an honest cittisen. When I gave the measure to my tailor to inquire how much mohaire would serve to make a petticoate and wastcoate to a young gentlewoman of that bignese and stature, hee considered itt a long time, and said hee had made many gownes and suites, butt hee had never made any to such a person in his life.
I thought hee was in the right; butt his meaning was, hee had never seene any woman of so low a stature have so big a wast; however hee made itt as exactly fitt as if hee had taken the measure himselfe. Itt was a mixed mohaire of a light haire couler and blacke, and ye under-petticoate was scarlett.

All things beinge now ready, upon the 20. of Aprill, 1648, in the evening, was the time resolved on for ye Duke's escape. And in order to that, itt was designed for a week before every night as soon as ye Duke had suped hee and those servants that attended his Highnese (till the Earle of Northumberland and ye rest of the howse had suped) wentt to a play called hide and seek, and sometimes hee would hide himselfe so well that in halfe an howers time they could not find him. His Highnese had so used them to this, that when hee wentt really away they thought hee was butt att the usual sport. A litle before the Duke wentt to super that night hee called for the gardiner, who only had a treble key besides that wch ye Duke had, and bid him give him that key till his owne was mended, wch hee did. And after his Highnese had suped, hee immediately called to goe to ye play, and wentt downe the privy staires into the garden, and opened the gate that goes into the parke, treble locking all the doores behind him. And att the garden gate C. B. waited for his Highnese, and putting on a cloake and periwig huried him away to the parke gate, where a coach waited yt caried them to ye watter side, and, taking the boate that was apointed for that service, they rowed to the stairs next the bridge, where I and Miriam waited in a private howse hard by that C. B. had prepared for dresing his Highnese, where all things were in a readinesse. Butt I had many feares, for C. B. had desired mee, if they came nott there precisely by ten a' clocke, to shift for my selfe, for then I might conclude they were discovered, and so my stay there could doe noe good, but prejudice my selfe. Yett this did not make me leave the howse, though ten a'clock did strike, and he that was intrusted often went to the landing place and saw noe boate comming was much discouraged, and asked me what I would doe. I told him I came there with a resolution to serve his Highness, and I was fully determined not to leave that place till I was out of hopes of doing what I came there for, and would take my hazard. He left me to goe againe to ye watter side, and while I was fortifying myselfe against what might arrive to me, I heard a great noise of many as I thought comming up staires, which I expected to be soldiers to take me, but it was a pleasing disappoint-ment, for ye first that came in was ye Duke, who with much joy I took in my armes and gave God thankes for his safe arivall. His Highnese called "Quickely quickely dress me;" and, putting of his cloaths, I dressed him in the women's habitt that was prepared, which I fitted his Highnese very well, and was very pretty in it. After hee had eaten something I made ready while I was idle lest his Highnese should bee hungry, and having sentt for a Woodstreet cake (which I knew hee loved) to take in the barge, with as much hast as could bee his Highnese wentt crosse the bridge to ye staires where the barge lay, C. B. leading him; and immediately the boatemen plied the oare so well that they were soone outt of sight, having both wind and tide with ye. Butt I afterwards heard the wind changed and was so contrary that C. B. told me hee was terribly afraid they should have beene blowne backe againe. And the Duke said, "Doe any thing with me rather than lett mee goe backe againe," which putt C. B. to seeke helpe where itt was only to bee had, and, after hee had most fervently suplicated assistance from God, presently the wind blew faire, and they came safely to there intended landing place. Butt I heard there was some difficuly before they gott to ye ship at Graves-End, which had like to have discovered them had not Collonell Washington's lady assisted them.

After the Duke's barge was out of sight of ye bridge, I and Miriam wentt where I apointed the coach to stay for mee, and made drive as fast as ye coachman could to my brother's howse, where I staid. I mett none in the way that gave mee any apprehension that the designe was discovered, nor was it discovered abroad till the next day, for (as I related before) ye Duke having used to play at hide and seek, and to conceal himselfe a long time when they mist him at the same play, thought hee would have discovered himselfe as formerly when they had given over seeking him. But a much longer time being past than usually was spent in that devartissement, some began to apprehend that his Highnese was gone in earnest past their finding, wch made the Earle of Northumberland (to whose care he was committed) after strict search made in the howse of St. James and all thereabouts to noe purpose, to send and acquaint the Speaker of the House of Commons that the Duke was gone, but how or by what means he knew not, but desired that there might bee orders sent to the Cinque Ports for stopping all ships going out till the passengers were examined and search made in all suspected places where his Highnese might be concealed. Though this was gone about with all the vigillancy imagginable, yett it pleased God to disappoint them of there intention by so infatuating those severall persons who were imployed for writting orders that none of them were able to writ one right, butt ten or twelve of ye was cast by before one was according to their mind. This accountt I had from Mr. N. who was mace-bearer to the Speeker all that time and a witnese of itt. This disorder of the clarkes contributed much to the Duke's safety, for hee was att sea before any of the orders came to the ports, and so was free from what was designed if they had taken his Highnese.

Though severalls were suspected for being accesory to the escape, yett they could nott charge any with itt butt the person who wentt away, and hee being out of there reach, they tooke noe notice as either to examine or imprison others. After C. B. had beene so successfull in serving the Duke, the Prince imployed him and commanded him backe againe to London, with severall instructions that might have beene serviceable to the King, had nott God Almighty thought fitt to blast all indeavours that might have conduced to his Matics safety. As soone as C. B. landed beyond ye Tower, hee writt to desire I would doe him the favor as to come to him, as beeing the only person who att that time hee could trust; and when hee should aquaint mee with ye ocation of his comming, hee doupted not butt I would forgive him for the liberty hee had taken. I knowing hee could come upon no accountt but in order to serve the King, I imediately sent for an honest hackney coachman who I knew might bee trusted, and taking Miriam with mee, I wentt where hee was, who giving mee a short information of what hee was employed aboutt, and how much secrecy was to be used both as to ye King's interest and his owne security, itt is nott to be doupted butt I contributed what I could to both, and, taking him backe in the coach with mee, left him att a private lodging nott very farre from my brother's howse, that a servantt of his had prepared for him. The earnest desire I had to serve the King made mee omitt noe opertu-nity wherein I could bee usefull, and the zeale I had for his Mat^y made me nott see what inconveniencys I exposed myselfe to; for my intentions being just and innocent made mee nott reflect what conclusions might bee made for the private visitts which I could nott butt necessarly make to him in order to the King's service, for whatever might relate to itt y^t came within my knowledge I gave him accountt of, and hee made such use of itt as might most advance his designe. As long as there was any posibility of conveying letters secrettly to the King, hee frequently writt, and receaved very kind letters from his Mat^ie, with several instructions and letters to persons of honour and loyalty; butt, when all access was debarred by the strict guard placed aboutt the King, all hee could then doe was to keepe warme those affections in such as hee had influence in till a seasonable opertunity to evidence their love and duty to his Mat^ie.

Though C. B. discovered himselfe to none but such as were of known integrity, yett many comming to that place where hee lay made him think itt convenientt for his own safety to goe some time into the country, and att his returne to bee more private. One evening when I wentt to see him I found him lying upon his bed, and asking him if hee were nott well, hee told mee he was well enough, butt had receaved a visitt in the morning from a person that hee wondred much how hee found him out; he was a solicittor that was imploied by all the gentlemen in the county where hee lived, wch was hard by where his wife dwelt, and he had brought him word shee was dead, and named the day and place where shee was buried. I confese I saw him nott in much griefe, and therefore I used nott many words of consolation, butt left him afther I had given him accountt of the busynese I wentt for. I neither made my visitts lese nor more to him for this news, for Loyalty beeing the principle that first led mee to a freedome of converse with him, so still I continued itt as often as there was occation to serve that interest. Hee putt on mourning, and told the reason of itt to such as hee conversed with, butt had desired the gentleman who had first aquainted him with itt nott to make itt puplicke lest the fortune hee had by his wife and shee injoyed while shee lived should bee sequestred. To bee short, afther a litle time hee one day, when I was alone with him, began to tell mee that now hee was a free man hee would say that to mee wch I should have never knowne while hee lived if itt had becne other ways, which was, that hee had a great respect and honour for mee since the first time hee knew mee, butt had resolved itt should die with him if hee had nott beecn in a condition to declare itt withoutt doing mee prejudice, for hee hoped if hee could gaine an interest in my affection itt would nott apeare so unreasonable to marry him as others might representt itt, for if itt pleased God to restore the King, of which hee was nott yett outt of hopes, hee had a promise of beeing one of his Maties bedchamber; and, though that should faile, yett what hee and I had together would be about eight hundred pound sterling a yeare, wch, with the Lord's blesing, might be a competency to any contentmentt minds.
Hee so often insisted on this when I had occation to be with him that att last hee prevailed with mee, and I did consentt to his prosposal, and resolved to marry him as soone as itt apeared convenientt; butt wee delayed it till wee saw how itt pleased God to determine

of the King's affaires. I know I may bee condemned as one that was too easily prevailed with, butt this I must desire to bee considered, hee was one who I had beeone conversantt with for severall yeares before; one that professed a great freindship to my beloved brother Will; hee was unquestionably loyall, handsome, a good skollar, wch gave him the advantages of writting and speaking well, and the cheepest ornamentt hee had was a devout life and conversation. Att least hee made itt appeare such to mee, and what ever misfortune hee brought upon mee I will doe him that right as to acknowledge I learnt from him many excellent lessons of piety and vertue, and to abhorre and detest all kinds of vice. This beeing his constant dialect made mee thinke myselfe as secure from ill in his company as in a sanctuary. From the prejudice wch that opinion brought upon mee I shall advise all never to thinke a good intention can justify what may bee scandalous, for though one's actions bee never so innocent, yett they cannott blame them who suspect them guilty when there is apearance of there deserved reproach; and I confese I did justly suffer ye scourge of the young for exposing my selfe upon any consideration to what might make mee liable to itt, for which I condemne my selfe as much as my sevearest enemy.

The King's misfortune dayly increasing, and his enemy's rage and malice, both were att last determined in that execrable murder, never to be mentioned without horror and detestation. This putt such a dampe upon all designes of the Royall party, that they were for a time like those that dreamed; but they quickly roused up themselves, and resolved to leave noe meanes unesayed that might evidence their loyalty. Many excellent designes were laid, butt the Lord thought fitt to disapoint them all, that His owne power might bee ye more magnified by bringing home ye King in peace when all hostile attempts failed. In the meane time C. B. was nott idle though unsuccesfull, and still continued in or about London, where hee could bee most secure. One day when I wentt to see him I found him extraordinary melancholy; and, having taken mee by the hand, and lead mee to a seate, wentt from mee to the other side of ye roome, with I wondered at, because hee usually satte by mee when I was with him. With a deepe sigh hee said, "You must nott wonder at this distance, for I have had news since I saw you, that, if itt bee true, my distance from you must be greater, and I must conclude my selfe the most unfortunate of men." I was much troubled at the discourse, butt itt was increased when hee told mee the reason of itt, for hee said one had informed him that his wife was living. What a surprise that was to mee none can imagine, because I beleve none ever met with such a tryall. Hee, seeing mee in great disorder, said, "Pray be nott discomposed till the truth bee knowne, for upon the first intimation of itt I sent away my man Ned B., who served mee long and knows the country and persons where she lived, who will returne within a fortnight. Itt be false, I hope you will have no reason to change your thoughts and intentions; if itt should bee true, God is my witnese I am nott guilty of the contrivance of the report of her being dead, nor had noe designe butt what I thought justifiable." I could not contradict what hee said, and charity led mee to beleve him. I left him in great disturbance, butt could conclude nothing till the returne of his servantt, who brought word that his wife died att the same time that hee first gott knowledge of itt, and that hee was att her grave where shee was buried, with I beleving, continued my former resolutions, and intended to marry as soone as wee could putt our affaires in such order as to preventt sequestration.

About this time my brother Will came home much discontented, as hee had great reason, for some persons, who mayde itt there busynesse to sow the seed of jelousy betwixt the King and Duke of Yorke, in pursuite of that accused my brother that hee kept a correpondence with C. B., who staid att London to hold intelligence in Scotland, and ther designe was to have the Duke of Yorke come there to be crowned King. Though the King did not beleave itt, as hee told my brother when hee sentt for him, yett such was his presentt condition that hee must either banish him or els disobleige those persons whose service was most useful to him. This his Matie expresed with some trouble; butt, Will, (sayd hee,) to shew you I give noe creditt to this accusation, when ever you heare I am in Scotland (where I hope shortly to bee) come to mee and you shall have no doubt of my kindnesse. My brother humbly intreated his Matie to lett him knowe his accusers and putt him to a tryall, and if they could make good what they charged him with hee would willingly die. “Noe, (says the King,) I will nott tell you who they are, and if you have any suspittion of the persons I charge you upon your allegiance, and as you expect my faver hereafter, nott to challenge them upon it.” Thus with great injustice and sevearity was my brother banished the three courts, the King’s, Queene Mother’s, and the Princese Royall’s. When hee came outt from ye King a gentleman tooke him in his armes who expresed great kindnesse and much trouble for his ill usage, who hee knew undouptedly to bee one of his greatest enemys. All hee said to him was, “You know the King hath tied mee up, and therefore I will say noe more.” Had not duty and former obligations beene a tye to all hee was capable to perfomne, itt was butt an ill requittall for many yeares faithfull service and much hardship, with hazard of his life, for none could brand him with disloyalty or cowardice, nor did hee know how to refuse any imploymentt ye was serviceable to the King though never so dangerous to undertake.

Butt this injury contributed through the mercy of God to his eternall good, for hee tooke ship imediately, and landed neere Cobham, where, by the faver of the D. and D. of Richmond, hee was well entertained; butt nothing could free him of the great melancholy hee tooke, for, as a person of worth told mee who was a wittnesse of itt, hee would steal from the company, and going into the wood and lye many hours together upon the ground, where perhaps he caught cold, and that, mixing with discontented humours, turned to a feaver whereoff hee died. Butt I blese God I had ye satissfac- tion to see him dye as a good Christian, for, as soone as hee found himself distempered, hee writt to mee to gett him a private lodging neere the watter side, which I did, and hee comming there immediately went to bed, and never rise out of it. After hee had given mee accountt of what I have now related hee told mee hee had heard Doctor Wild preach att Cobham, and that hee was extremely well pleased with his sermon, and desired mee to inquire for him, and intreat him to come to him, wch hee did willingly and frequently, and they had both much sattisfaction in one another. My brother beeing desirous to receave the comunion, the Doctor apointed the next morning for ye celebration, butt before wee were to comunicate, my brother said, "I am now going to partake of that most holy sacrament, and shortly after to give an account to God Almighty for all my actions in this life, and I hope, S', (said hee to Doctor W.) you will beleevve I durst nott speake an untruth to you now, and therefore I take this time to assure you that I am nott guilty of what they have accused mee of to the King, and I desire you to vindicate mee." I asked him if hee thought C. B. had any hand in such a designe. Hee said hee thought hee might say as much for him as for himselfe. So, having sometime composed himselfe after saying this, the usuall prayers of the church beeing ended, my brother, weake as hee was, putt himselfe upon his knees in the bed, and so receaved the blesed sacramentt, and wee that were with him. Hee had before expresed great charity in forgiving his enemys; and, though hee had told mee who (upon good grounds hee had reason to beleive) they were, yett hee injoynd mee as I loved him to forgive them, for they had proved his best freinds, for, by there meanes, hee came to see the vanity of the world, and to seeke after the blesednesse of that life wch is unchangeable. While hee lay sicke, C. B. came once to see him, and butt once, because there was search made for him.

The constantt attendance I gave my brother kept mee from seeing C. B. or sending offfen to him; but early one morning one of his servants came and told mee that, beeing sentt early outt, as they returned they saw an officer with some soldiers marching that way where hee privately lay, and that hee feared his master was betraied.
I then tooke my sister into the next roome and told her I must now comunicate something to her that I had concealed as knowing shee would nott aprov of my inttention, butt all considerations beeing now laid aside I must owne the concerne I had for C. B., and with teares beged of her by all the kindnese shee had for mee, or if ever shee desired to contribute anything to my contenttment, that shee would make inquiry what was become of C. B., and asist him to escape if itt was posible. The trouble shee saw me in prevailed so with her that itt made her say litle as to what I might expect of severallity, and tooke a coach and wentt immediately where shee thought itt most likely to doe him service, and itt proving butt a false alarum served only to make him the more circumspect, and did afterwards something justify mee that I att that time owned to my sister my resolution of marrying him.

My brother's feaver increasing and his strength decaying, a few days putt an end to his conflict, for as death was wellcome to him so hee came peaceably as a freind and nott an enemy, for I beleeve never any died more composedly of a feaver in the strengh of there youth. Hee seldome or never raved nor expresed much of dissatisfaction att the usage hee had mett with; only once hee said, Were I to live a thousand yeares I would never sett my foott within a court againe, for there is nothing in itt butt flattery and falshhood.

After my brother was buried in the Savoy church, neere my father and mother, within few days I wentt againe to my brother Murray's, where I staid till the impertunity of my Lady H. prevailed with me to goe home with her to the North. My brother and sister aproved of itt, and C. B. most willingly consentted to itt, resolving sodainly to follow mee and publickly to avow what wee intended, and to live with a gentleman, a friend of his that was a great Royallist, where hee expected to be wellcome till such time as wee found itt convenientt for us to returne where wee had more interest. This beeing determined, I left all that concerned mee in such hands as hee advised, with hopes of preventing sequestration, butt itt fell outt unhapily, as many things els did, and occasioned greater inconvenience. One of the great motives that invited mee to goe North was that itt began to be discoursed of amongst many Parliament men that I had beene instrumentall in the Duke's escape, and, knowing that severall weemen were secured upon lese grounds, I thought itt best to retire for a time out of the noise of itt. Itt was nott without trouble that I left my brother and sister, butt finding itt nesessary made itt the more easy. Wee began our journy September 10th, 1649, and had nothing all the way to disturb us till wee came to H., beyond Yorke, to a house of Sir C. H., where his sisters lived. There in one night both Sir C. and his lady fell so extremcly ill with vomitting and purging in so great violence yt nothing butt death was expected to them both, and some were so ill natured as to say they were poisoned, butt itt pleased God they recovered. And then there son tooke the small poxe, who was about 3 yeare old, his feaver great and apearance of being extraordinary full; and by the advise of Sr Thomas Gore (who studied phisicke more for devertisement then gaine) hee tooke a purge which carried away a great part of ye humour, so that nature, as hee said, would bee able to master the rest, and itt had so great succese that hee recovered perfectly well withoutt the least prejudice. I cannott butt mention this from the extraordinarynese of the cure. As soone as his health would allow of travaile, wee tooke journy and came to N. Castle, where I was so obleigingly intertained by Sr Ch. and his lady, and with so much respect from the whole familly, that I could nott butt thinke my selfe very happy in so good a societty, for they had an excellent governed familly, having great afflection for one another; all there servantts civill and orderly; had an excellent preacher for there chaplaine, who preached twice every Sunday in ye chapel, and dayly prayers morning and evening. Hee was a man of a good life, good conversation, and had in such veneration by all as if hee had beene there tutelar angell. Thus we lived sometime together, with so much peace and harmony as I thought nothing could have given an interruption to itt. Butt itt was too great to last long, for the post (going by weekly) one day brought mee sad letters; one from C. B. giving mee accountt that just the night before hee intended to come North, having prepared all things for accomplishing what we had designed, hee was taken and secured in the Gate-house att Westminster, and could expect nothing butt death. With much difficulty hee had gott that conveyed outt to mee to lett mee know what condition hee was in, and that hee expected my prayers, since nothing els I could doe could be avelable, for hee had some reason to apprehend those I was concerned in and might have in-fluence upon was his enemys, and therefore I might expect little assistance from them. Presently after I reeceived a letter from my brother M. and another from my sister N., his very seveare, hers more compasionate, but both representing C. B. under ye caracter of the most unworthy person living; that hee had abused mee in pretending his wife was dead, for shee was alive; and that her unckle Sir Ralph S. had assured them both of itt, wch made nott only them butt all that ever had kindnese for mee so abhorre him, that, though he were now likely to dye, yett none pittyed him. Had the news of either of these come singly itt had beene enough to have tryed the strengh of all the religion and vertue I had, butt so to bee surrounded with misfortunes conquered what ever could resist them, and I fell so extremely sicke that none expected life for mee. The care and concerne of S'r Ch. and his lady was very great, who sent post to Newcastle for a phisitian, butt hee beeing sicke could nott come, butt sentt things wch proved inefec-tuall. My distemper increased, and I grew so weake I could hardly speake. Aprehending ye aproach of death, I desired my Lady H. to vindicate mee to my brother and sister, for as I was ignorant and innocett of the guilt they taxed mee with, so I beleived C. B. was; and therefore I earnestly intreated her to writte to her father to bee his friend, and that malice might nott bee his ruine, wch shee promised; and having taken my last leave (as I thought) of them all, I desired Mr. N. (the chaplain) to recomende mee to the hands of my Redeemer, and I lay waiting till my change should come, and all was weeping about mee for that I expected as the greatest good. Butt itt seems the mercy of God would nott then condemme mee into hell, nor his justice suffer mee to goe to heaven; and therefor continued mee longer upon earth that I might know the infiniteness of his power who could suport mee under that load of calamitys. Having laine some houres speechlesse (how I employed that time may hereafter be knowne, if the Lord thinke fitt to make itt usefull unto any), I began to gape many times one after another, and I found sencibly like a returne of my spiritts, wth Mrs. Cullcheth seeing, came to mee and told mee if I saw another in that condition I could prescribe what was fitt for them; and therefore itt were a neglect of duty if I did not use what means I thought might conduce to my recovery. Her discourse made mee recollect what I had by mee that was proper for mee. I called to Crew (who served mee) for itt, and with ye use of some cordialls, I sencibly grew better, to the sattisfaction of all that was about mee. I confess death at that time had beene extremelly wellcome; but having intirely resigned myselfe up to the disposall of my gracious God, I could repine at nothing hee thought fitt to do with mee, for I knew hee could make either life or death for my advantage. Though that was great disturbance to mee wth my brother and sister had written to mee concerning C. B. wife's being alive, yett I gave nott the least creditt to itt, because I thought there information might come from such as might report itt out of malice or designe, for none of her relations loved him because hee was nott of there principles. And a considerable part of her portion being still in there hands, I judged it might bee still to keep that they raised that story, which had little influence upon mee, because I gave itt noe beleefe, only looked upon itt as a just punishment to have that thought true now wth I once mentioned when I thought itt nott true, only to conceale my intentions; for my Lord H. and my sister Murray (having observed C. B. come sometimes when he durst steale abroad to see mee,) said to mee one night, "I lay a wager you will marry C. B.” I smiled and said, “Sure, you would not have me marry another woman’s husband!” They replied, they knew not he had been married; upon which I told them whose niece she was (whom they both knew) that was his wife. But I did not say she was dead, though at that time I believed it; and therefore now looked on this as inflicted for my disimulation, for God requireth truth in the inward parts, and I have a thousand times beged his pardon for that failing.

Upon these grounds it was that I gave so little entertainment to that story, and all my trouble and fears was after I began to recover for C. B., lest the Parliament should condemn [him] to dye, as they had many gallant gentlemen before; but I was much supported one day by reading what fell out to be part of my morning devotion (Psa. 102, vers. 19, 20): “For he hath looked downe from ye height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth. To heare the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed to death.” I cannot omit to mention this because it was so seasonable a promise, and I was so assisted by faith to rely upon it that in a manner it overcame all my fears. To confirm it is not in vaine to believe and expect promised mercies, within few days there came severall letters both to Sir C. H., his lady, and my selfe, yt C. B. had made his escape out of the Gate-house just the night before he was to have beene brought to his tryall. None then could give account how or by what means he had gott out, but after wards I was informed by the person hee employed, that having with much dexterity conveyed into him a glase of aqua fortis, hee, with that and much paines, cutt the iron bars of ye window asunder, but lett it stand by a little hold till the time was fitt to make use of it, and then, having found means to appoint such as hee relyed upon to bee under the window at such a time as the guards were past that tour, hee tooke ye ropes of the bed and fastened them to some part of the window, and so wentt downe by them, but his weight made them faile, and hee fell downe not without hurt, but the next difficulty was a pailing that was aboutt the verge of the window, butt his asistant by standing upon one another's shoulders, reached over to him and gott him over the pailing, and so escaped the fury of his enemys; w^ch many was glad of, and more had joyned with them if they had nott beeene posesed with a prejudice against him for the injury they suposcd hee had done mee in persuading mee his wife was dead when shee was alive. Butt hee nott being now in a capacity to vindicate himselfe, itt was easy to lay upon him what guilt they pleased; butt all that his enemys could alledge never prevailed with mee to lessen one graine of my concerne for him, because all they could say was the report y^e shee was living, butt they never named the person that could testify itt from there owne knowledge, except such as might bee biased by what I have mentioned already. I cannott butt acknowledge I had great satissfaction in the news of his escape, and, though I was sometimes disturbed because I heard nott from him where hee was or how, yett I pleased myselfe with y^e hopes hee was well and secure, and so y^e better dispensed with my wantt of letters, since I knew he could nott convey them withoutt hazard of being discovered.

Itt is nott to bee imagined by any pious vertuous person (whose charity leads them to judge of others by themselves,) butt that I looked upon itt as an unparaleld misfortune, how innocent so ever I was, to have such an odium cast upon mee as that I designed to marry a man that had a wife, and I am sure none could detest mee so much as I abhored the thought of such a crime. I confese I looked upon itt as the greatest of afflictions; butt, that I might nott sett limitts to myself, the Lord thought fitt to shew hee could make mee suffer greater and yett suport mee under them. The first Sunday that my health and strengh would permitt mee to goe outt of my chamber, I went to the chapell in the morning (with y^e rest of y^e familly) to offer up thanksgiving to my God who had raised mee from y^e gates of death; and after dinner retiring into my chamber, as I usually did, the door being locked and I alone, I was reading a sermon with w^ch I was very well pleased, butt on a sodaine I was so disordered and in so great an agony that I thought itt nott fitt to be alone, and all the servantts being at dinner, and none within my call, I wentt immediately to Mr N. chamber, who was much surprised seeing mee come in so much disordered. I freely told him every circumstance, imagining hee was a person fitt to intrust with any disorder of my soule, and desired his prayers; which the Lord blest with so good succese, yt I immediately left trembling, and found a great serenity both of mind and body. Having giving him thanks for the great concerne hee shewed for mee, and had his promise to conceale what I had communicted to him, I left him to goe and make myselfe ready for attending my Lady H. to the chapell, thinking myselfe as secure of what I had said to him as if itt had beeene within my owne breast, where itt should have beeene still if I had then beeene aquainted, as I have beeene often since, with the effects of melancholy vapours, butt having never known them before in others or my selfe made them apare the more dreadfull; but those who have experience of them will I hope have the more charity for mee when they consider what effects they have had upon themselves.

I am sory I cannott relate my owne misfortunes withoutt reflecting upon those who was the ocation of them, especially beeing one of yt profession that I have ever looked upon with great respect. I have alreadly given a caracter of Mr. N. parts and practise, and how much he was valued by all the familly and such as conversed with him. One day hee having preached at Carlile at the meeting for the sise, when hee came home hee came to my chamber and told mee hee had left Sr Charles, and came home with Mr Culc., who had entertained him by the way with many variety of discourse, butt amongst the rest (said hee,) hee tells mee that my Lady H. is jelouse of Sr Ch. and you. I was strangely surprised to heare that, and said sure he was drunk, for, as I am sure I never gave her the least ocation, I am confidentt shee knows her owne interest so great in Sr Ch. that shee need not feare beeing suplanted by any; and besides, she knows all the concerne I can have for any her were there nothing els; ng the least thought that shee I had itt," said hee, "from any butt noe doupt hee hath had itt overnese to her before shee was l her concernes." Hee insisted any argumentts to confirme hee withall that hee had observed ice as formerly, and that hee ice should use one so ill who come to a remote place outt I found nothing of alteration tell her what I heard (though the long friendship betwixt us hee were guilty of the imper- ght dispose of mee how shee fication. All I concluded att that time was, that hee should bee free in telling mee what ever hee saw in my cariage that looked like giving ground for such a suspition. With many serious protestations hee freed mee for giving any ocation, butt dayly gave mee accountt of ye increase of itt. To bee as short as the circumstances will allow, hee was never with mee butt hee magnified Sr Ch. up to the skys; spoke much to his lady's disadvantage; butt what hee said of mee was so greatly allied to flattery that I should have obhored itt from any other that had nott apeared as hee did. At last I began

Having giving him shewed for mee, and had his pron nicated to him, I left him to attending my Lady H. to the ch what I had said to him as if itt where itt should have beene stil I have beene offfen since, with butt having never known them them apeare the more dreadfull them will I hope have the more what effects they have had upon

I am sory I cannott relate my upon those who was the occation of professyon that I have ever have allready given a caracter of Mr. N. parts and practis, and how much he was valued by all the familly and such as conversed with him. One day hee having preached at Carlile at the meeting for the sise, when hee came home hee came to my chamber and told mee hee had left Sr Charles, and came home with Mr Culc., who had entertained him by the way with many variety of discourse, butt amongst the rest (said hee,) hee tells mee that my Lady H. is jelouse of Sr Ch. and you. is already fixed, and that may secure her were there nothing els; but I am very farre from intertaining the least thought that shee can have any such suspition. "If I had itt," said hee, "from any other hand, I would thinke so too; but noe doubt hee hath had itt from his wife, who you know was governese to her before shee was maried, and is still intrusted with all her concernes." Hee insisted much on this discourse, and used many argumentts to confirme hee had reason to beleeve itt true, and withall that hee had observed of late shee was not so kind to mee as formerly, and that hee thought itt a strange thing that shee should use one so ill who had left all relations and friends to come to a remote place outt of kindness to her. I assured him I found nothing of alteration in her, and that I was resolved to tell her what I heard (though nott the author), and expected from the long friendship betwixt us that ingenuity as freely to owne if shee were guilty of the imperfection of jalousy, and that shee might dispose of mee how shee pleased, in order to her owne satisfacion. "Can you imagine (said hee,) that shee will owne to you shee is jalous? Noe; shee hath too much pride for that." "What will you then advise mee to doe?" I replied. "The truth is, shee is of so odd a humour, (said hee,) that it is hard in such a case what to advise. I hartily pitty Sr Ch., who I look upon as one of the finest gentlemen in the nation; and had hee had ye good fortune to have had you to have beene his wife, hee had been the hapiciest man alive." All I concluded att that time was, that hee should bee free in telling mee what ever hee saw in my cariage that looked like giving ground for such a suspition. With many serious protestations hee freed mee for giving any occasion, butt dayly gave mee accountt of ye increase of itt. To bee as short as the circumstances will allow, hee was never with mee butt hee magnified Sr Ch. up to the skys; spoke much to his lady's disadvantage; butt what hee said of mee was so greatly allied to flattery that I should have obhored itt from any other that had nott apeared as hee did. At last I began to observe my Lady II. grow more reserved than usuall, and the whole familly abate much of there respect; only Sr Ch. continued as formerly to mee. I used dayly to be till five a' clock with my Lady II. working, or any other devertisment that shee employed her selfe in, and then retired to my chamber for halfe an hower; then Sr Charles and his lady came and staid with mee (till the time wee wentt to ye chapell), either playing on the gitarre or with ye children that lay neere me, or discoursing, and this was for a long time our constant practice. Butt on a sodaine I found an alteration, for my Lady II. would come to the doore with Sir C., butt when hee came in shee wentt into the children's chamber, which I observing followed her and left Sir C. in my chamber. One night as I was thus going outt to follow his lady he pulled mee backe and would noyt lett mee goe, and ye more presing hee was to have me stay the more earnest I was to goe, butt seeing hee was resolute I staid. Hee told mee hee had observed of late that I was growne very strange to him, and that when ever hee came in I wentt outt of my chamber. I said itt was only to waite upon his lady, and threfore hee could noyt take itt ill. Hee saw mee in great disorder, and was very urgett to know what the reason of itt was. I confese the teares were in my eyes, which hee seeing vowed hee would noyt goe outt of the roome till I resolved him. I told him I would upon the condition hee would promise noyt to speake of itt to any person, and that hee would doe what I should desire. Hee said hee would if it were in his power, and bid mee bee free with him. I said, "Sir C. I confese I have receaved much civility from you ever since I came into your familly, and as I know you shewed itt as a testimony of your afflection to your lady because I had an interest in her faver, so I valued itt upon yt accountt, and noyt as I beleevd I deserved itt; but now I must desire you as you respect your selfe, as you love your lady, or have any regard to mee, re-trench your civility in to more narrow bounds, els you may prejudice your selfe in the opinion of those who thinke mee unworthy you converse." Hee grewe angry, and said hee must know who those persons were; I said hee must pardon mee, for that itt was enough I had told him how hee might prevent an inconvenience, and if hee either divulged what I had said, or did not performe the condition in doing what I desired, I would goe out of his howse upon the first discovery. I left him after I said this and went to his lady, who sometimes would be free enough, another time so reserved as shee would hardly speake to mee, either at table or any other time, which made mee then give the more creditt to what Mr. N. had told mee of her; but againe I was att a stand when being alone with her one day shee told mee she knew not what to think of Mr. N., but shee bid mee bee upon my guard when I conversed wth him, for shee assured mee hee was not my friend so much as I believed. I thanked her for her advise, but knew nott what to conclude, because hee had possesed mee with an opinion that she was lesened in her respect to him because hee was so civill to mee; but this I concealed from her, knowing itt was upon another ground, wth may nott bee amisse to insert here.

There was two young ladys in the howse who had beeue bred up Papists, and by Sir Ch: example and care was turned Protestants.
These two Sr C. recomended to Mr. N.'s care to instruct them in the principles of our religion, and they dayly went to his chamber, sometimes together, sometimes alone, as there conveniency led them. They beeing very young, and hugely vertuous and innocent, and having Sir C. order for going frequently to his chamber, thought the oftener they went the better, and sometimes after super would goe and stay there an hower or two. They had a discreet woman attended them, who I had recomended. Shee came to mee one morning and told mee shee could nott butt aquaint mee with something that shee would seek my advise in;
I said I would give itt freely. Says shee, "You know I am intrusted with the care of these young ladys, and that Sr Ch. orders them to goe frequently to Mr. N. chamber; but I have observed the eldest of them stay much longer then the other, and to goe after super, and sometimes stay there till 12 a' clocke, and though I have gone severall times to call her, yett she would nott come with me." I said I was sory to hear that; for, though I did beleewe shee might as innocently converse with him as with her brother, yett itt might give occasion of reflection upon them both, wth I wished might bee prevented, butt withoutt saying anything to Sr Ch. or his lady. This fell outt to bee aboutt the beginning of my Lady H. growing a little reserved to mee; butt when ever I had any opertunity of conversing with her I still brought in some discourse of love and friendship and jelousy, and that sometimes itt might bee where there was greatest intimacy; butt if I could have a suspition of any person that I thought worth my friendship, shee would bee the first person her selfe that I would declare itt to, for if shee were vertuous there is nothing I could desire her to doe that shee would omitt for my satisfaction, and if I beleved her vicious she were nott worthy my converse. I uttered this with more than an ordinary sence, wch I thought made some impresion of her; and I thought I was fully confirmed, when early one morning shee came into my chamber before I was outt of my bed, and lying downe by me shee said, "I have so much confidence of your friendship and discretion, that I am come to seeke your advise and assistance how to manage what I have of late discovered, that if nott prevented will make great disorder amongst us." I tooke her in my armes with great joy, and told her shee might as freely comunicate any-thing to mee as to her owne hart, for I should bee fast in concealing and active in doing what ever shee pleased to intrust mee with; beeing fully perswaded if shee were guilty of that imperfection of jelousy shee was now come to aquaint mee with itt, and to advise aboutt a remedy. Butt I was in a mistake; for shee told mee shee had of late made some litle observation that Mr F., who was the eldest of the two sisters, was looked upon more kindly by Mr N. then was usuall with his gravity; wch gave her the curiosity the day before, when she wentt out of the dinner-robe an after dinner, all the company being gone, and remembiring shee had left them two together, shee turned backe, and looking through the crany of the doore shee saw Mr. N. pull her to him, and with much kindnesse lye her head in his bosome. I said that might bee very innocently done, though I confessed it had beene better undone; "for sure hee can have no ill design, being, I beleeve, a very good man, and she is too much a child to think of marryng her though there were nothing els to object." Shee said shee was nott so much a child as her stature made her appeare, and threfore had great apprehensions that ye respect Sr Charles had for him might encourge him to hope, if hee could gaine her consentt, to obtayne his; "butt if hee should have the least ground to suspect what I fear, hee would never suffer him in his sight; and if wee wanted him, you know (says my Lady,) that in these times we should find itt difficult to gett one in his place who could so well discharge his duty to our sattisfaction, and yett so discreet as not to give offence to those of a contrary judgementt, such as most are hereaboutt." I acknowledged itt was true that her La. said, and in my opinion itt would bee best for mee to speake (since her La. would intrust none els with itt,) to him aboutt itt. And I thought hee was so ingenious a person, and had often profesed to have so great an opinion of mee, that I thought hee would not conceale his intention from mee, and I should freely give her La. an account of his answear. I made use of this opertunity to insist much upon the sattisfaction I had in her long continued friendship, and that I hoped, what ever my present misfortune was, yett that shee would make noe conclusions to my prejudice without giving mee leave to vindicate my selfe; wth shee promised, and left mee, having ingaged mee to lett none know what had pased betwixt us.

The first conveniency I had I told Mr. N. that I was going to ask him a question, and that I desired and expected hee would bee ingenious in resolving mee, because itt was nott to sattisy my owne curiosity butt outt of an intent to serve him, wth I could nott doe if hee were reserved in his answear. Hee seemed to bee surprised with this discourse, butt assured mee hee would bee very ingenious. I asked him then if hee had any inclination for Mrs. F. or any designe to marry her; he protested with much seriousnese he had nott.
said I was very glad to hear it, for now with the more confidence I could suprize the suspition wch some had of it. "Butt (said hee,) what would you have done if I had confessed I had loved her?" "Truly (I replied,) I would have representted to you the prejudice you would have brought upon yourselfe; for undoubtedy Sr Ch., who is now your great freind, would turne your professed enemy, and make all others so that hee had influence upon." Therfore, as his intentions was free from such a designe, so I desired his converse might bee suitable, and I would then indeaver to convince them of there error who apprehended what I had told him.

I gave my Lady H. an accountt of what discourse Mr. N. and I had, wch shee was sattisfied with; butt this was the ground upon wch I knew my Lady H. had nott so good an opinion of Mr. N. as formerly, and therfore I could nott well know what to thinke when my Lady told mee, as I have allready mentioned, that hee was nott my freind so much as I beleaved, nor so good a secretary. I had the same information from her woman to (a discreet person who till that time loved mee well). I thought I would take a triall of him, and the first time hee came into my chamber, hee falling upon his usuall discourse, regretting to see my Lady H. so unkind to mee, I said I confessed I could nott butt look upon itt as my greatest misfortune, and such as swallowed up my former trouble, because to any one that should beleeve mee guilty of such unworthy sese as oc- cationed her unkindnesse itt could nott butt bee a confirmation of ye crime laid to my charge with C. B., and the more unpardonable because ignorance in this could bee noe excuse. I said I would com- unicate a secrett to him if hee would solemnly promise nott to discover itt to any person living; wch hee engaged with all the protestations yt was fitt for one of his profesion. I told him I was maried, and if hee beleved I understood what either love or duty tied mee to, that was enough to secure my Lady H. from her apprehensions, though I had never had a value for her friendship. (I confess I only told him this outt of designe to try if hee would speake of itt againe, and was indifferent whether itt was beleev'd true or false, since I hoped a little time would make the discovery.) Hee seemed to be highly sencible of the injury shee did mee, and att my request undertooke to tell her that hee had observed her unkindnese, and as much as was fitt for him to prese for the reason of itt, w^ch if shee gave, then to asert my inocence and ye wrong shee did bothe to her husband and her selfe; and in this I thought hee would oblige both them as well as mee. This hee promised, but how hee performed itt shall bee after manifest.

I saw dayly my Lady H. grow now to that height of strangeness that when I spoke to her shee would give mee noe answere, or if shee did, itt was with that slightnesse that I could nott butt bee very sencible of itt. And that w^ch angred mee most was, that when ever Sr Ch. came where I was, hee was ten times more free in his converse then hee had beene before I had spoken to him. These two extremees with my owne present condition was deplorable, having spent all the mony I brought with mee, beeing in a strange place where I had neither friendship nor aquaintance with any. To London I durstt not goe, for feare of beeing secured upon the account of the Duke's escape; and besides, I knew I need not expect any thing butt unkindnesse from my brother and sister; and how to send to C. B. to advise with him I knew nott. To stay where I was I had no manner of satisfaction. And if I had known whither to goe, to leave that famillie with such an odium as was laid upon mee, could nott butt make mee unwelcomme any where. Thus, when I reflected upon my disconsolate condition, I could find content in nothing butt in resorting to The hearer of prayer, who never leaves or forsakes those who trust in him. To the God of mercy I poured forth my complaint in the bitternese of my soule, and with abundant teares presented my suplication to him that judgeth righteously and did know my inocence, and therefore I interceeded for the merits of my Redeemer that hee would deliver mee out of the trouble that incompanied mee round, and direct mee how to dispose of my selfe in yt sad exegentt that I was in; and having resigned my selfe wholy to the disposall of his will, I did with confidence expect a deliverance, because I knew him whom I trusted.

By the way I cannot omit to mention what was remarkeable the time I was in that family. One night, being fast asleepe, I was sodainely wakened with the shaking of the bed somewhat violentt, but of short continuance. In the morning I told Sr Ch. and my Lady that I had heard of earthquakes, but I was confidentt I had felt one that night, and related how itt was. They laughed att mee, and said I had only dreamt of itt. I could nott convince them, nor they mee; butt a little before dinner came in some gentlemen that lived within 3 or 4 mile, and Sr Charles asked them what news: they replied the greatest they knew was that there had beene an earthquake that night, and that several howses were shaken downe with itt. Then they beleevd what I had told them. Another day my Lady H. and I was sitting together alone in my chamber, aboutt an ell or more distant from on-another, and sodainely the roome did shake, so that both our heads knockt together. Shee looked pale like death, and I beleive I did the same, and wee were hardly well recovered from our feares when Sr C. came in to see how wee were, and told us hee was walking in the gallery with Mr. N. and that they were so shaken they could skarce hold there feett, and was forced to hold themselves on the sides of the howse. These both hapened in the yeare 1649.

Butt to returne where I left. My Lady H. strangenese did nott make mee neglect anything that I usually did before, and one Sunday morning I wentt to her chamber to waite upon her as formerly when shee wentt to the chapell. I found the doore shutt, butt heard her talke to her weemen; so I knockt. One of them came to the doore, and asked who was there. When they knew itt was I, they said they could nott open the doore for there lady was busy. I thought this was a great allteration; however, I said nothing, butt wentt up to walke in the gallery, wch was ye usuall passage to the chapell, till shee was ready to goe. I had nott walked a turne or two butt Sr Ch. came to mee. I was in disorder, wch hee seeing asked what ailed mee. I told him I found hee had been unjust to mee, and I should bee so just to my selfe in keeping my promise as that I resolved the next day to leave his howse, for I could nott suffer to live in any place where I had nott the faver of the owners. "I know (says hee,) that you take itt ill to see my wife so strange to you; and shee doth itt a' purpose that you may inquire the reason of itt from her selfe, and then shee will resolve you." I said that should nott bee long in doing, nor had itt beene so long undone, butt that shee had avoided all occations that might give mee opertunity of speaking to her. (Another reason w'ch I did nott mention was that Mr. N. had used many argumentts to diswade mee from taking notice of itt to her, some of them nott much to her advantage.)

Wee wentt all to the chapell together, and afther sermon the post came with letters while wee were att dinner, some to them and some to mee. I made use of this when wee rose from the table to tell my Lady H. that I had receaved letters from London, and that there was something of concerne I had to say to her La^p, and asked where I might have her alone. Shee told mee shee would come within a little while to my chamber; where I wentt, and within a little while shee came there, and I taking her in my armes kist her, and wellcomed her to my chamber as a great stranger. So locking y' doore wee sate downe. "Madam, (said I,) though I made a letter the pretence for seeking this faver to speake with you, yett there is nothing in that worth your La. knowledge, and the only thing I have to say is to beg of you by all the friendship and kindnese you ever had for mee to bee free with mee, and lett mee know what I have done to make you of late so unkind." "Truly (said shee,) I wondred you were so long inquiring, and resolved till you asked the question I would never tell you; butt now you have begun lett mee aske you how you could have the vanity to beleeve St Ch. was in love with you, and I was jealous of you; and have the confidence to speake of itt to Mr. N. and speake so unworthily of mee as you have done to him this long time, as if I were the most contemptable creature living, and that you pittied S\^c Ch. for having such a wife? Was this done like a freind? Oh! (said shee,) if I had nott had itt from Mr. N. who is so good a man that I cannott butt beleeve him, I should never have given faith to itt from any other person." I was I confese astonished to heare him given as the athrow of that accusation, beeing all his owne words w^ch hee had offfen used to mee as his opinion, butt itt seemes hee had represented them as mine. "Madam, (said I,) I cannot wonder att y^ strangenese if you beleevd this true, butt rather how you could suffer such a one within your familly." "Had I followed Mr. Nicolls advise (shee replied,) I had sentt you away long since; for hee prest itt offfen, and when hee could nott prevaile with mee hee writ to my father, from whom I receaved a very seveare letter for letting you stay so long with mee. This I now tell you plainly, to confirme what I once told you before, that Mr. Nicolls was nott your freind so much as you beleeved, nor I so unworthy as y^ character you gave of mee." "Madam, (said I,) I must acknowledge I did beleeve him my freind, and so excellent a man that I thought, as all in your familly did, that itt was a blesing to have him in y^ howse. Butt now so much the greater is my misfortune to have him for my accuser, who is so much respected by all, and whose very profesion would inforce beleefe. I love nott retaliation, and to returne ill for ill, butt since I have no other way to asert my owne inoceeny I must freely declare hee was himselfe the only person that tooke paines to perswade mee you were jelouse of mee; and when I resolved to vindicate my selfe from whatever might seeme to give ocation for itt, hee diswaded mee, and said you had too much pride to owne itt, and that you would butt laugh att mee, and twould expose mee to your scorne; and what hee related as my words were his owne, w^ch when at any time I contredicted, hee would say itt was my partiality made mee defend you, and nott my reason. This, madam, is so great a truth that I will owne itt before him whenever you find itt convenientt. But pray, madam, (said I,) when hee told you all these things to my disadvantage, did itt nott lesen your beleefe of itt comming from a person who professest to have so great respect for mee, and yett performing acts so contrary to it? Did not this plead for mee in your thoughts, that hee who could dissemble might bee unjust, and I innocent?" "I confesse (said my Lady,) itt did prevale much on your side, and one day when hee was railing against you I said to him, How comes you are so civill to her, and professe so great a esteeeme of her, if you have so ill an opinion of her? I an esteeeme of her? (replied hee,) I could nott butt bee civill to her because I saw Sr Ch. and your La. respect her; butt God is my witnese I never looked upon her butt as one of the ayreiest things that ever I saw, and admired what itt was your La. and Sr Ch. saw in her to bee so kind to her." I smiled and said, "I wish I could as easily confirme hee was the author of what hee related of mee, as I can, under his owne hand, that hee had better thoughts of mee then so ayry a thing as hee then represented mee." Shee was desirous to see ye letter; wch I shewed her, with the copy of my owne to wch his was an answere, and was the first letter that ever I copied of my owne, and fell outt well that I had itt, els his would nott have been well understood (the occation of itt was, att the first notice I had of C. B. wife's being alive, before itt came to bee publickly knowne, itt is nott to bee imagined butt itt putt mee in great disorder, and, having none I would communicate itt to, I writt a serious letter to him representing something of [the] disorder I was in, and earnestly desired his prayers, to wch his letter answered; and were itt nott too tedious I should insert them both here). As soon as my Lady H. read the letter, shee said, "I am afraid this man hath deceaved us all, and will prove a villaine." While wee were at this discourse Sr Ch. knoet att the doore; wee lett him in, and he smiling said, "I hope you understand one another." Wee gave him some short accountt of what had beeene betwixt us, wch hee said did confirme what hee had beeene of opinion of a pritty while; "butt (sayed hee,) I will injoyne you both, what ever paseth betwixt you when you are alone, lett noe person know butt that you are still att the same distance you were before, till my returne; for I am imediately informed of some mose-troopers that are plundering in the country, and I and all my men are going to try if wee can take them; therfore you must pray for mee, since I cannot goe with you now to the chapell." Wee both promised to follow his injunctions, and parted. Though I did what I could to conceal anything of sattisfaction, yet the joy I had to see some glimps of light apeere for my vindication putt a visible change upon mee. And my Lady H. found itt deficult to restraine her former kindnese from appearing after shee began to find shee had beene injured as well as I. When Sr Ch. returned hee was a witnese of many debates betwixt us. When shee considered what a person Mr. N. was, shee then condemned mee guilty of all hee accused mee of; but when I urged ye many yeares experience shee had had of my converse, and whether shee had ever knowne mee doe any unworthy act, then, when shee reflected upon that, shee condemned him. Butt, to bee short, shee concluded that itt was fitt to have her cleared from the aspersion of jelousy and ye consequences of itt, wth one of us had taxed her with, and none had more reason to prese that then I who suffred most by itt. Att last we resolved as the fairest way, for mee to goe to Mr. N. and tell him that I was resolved to vindicate my selfe, and therefore to desire him nott to take itt ill if I brought him for a witnese of my innocency, who was the first and only person that told mee of my lady’s beeing jelouse, and who had offten assured mee hee saw nothing in my cariage that could give ye least ground for itt. Sr C. had left us to our contriveance. And when wee were determined I left my Lady H., and, apointing the garden to bee our meeting place, where I was to bring Mr N., I wentt to his chamber, butt found him nott there. I imediately wentt alone to the garden, to the walke where my Lady H. and I had designed to meett, and in the way to itt I saw Sir C. and Mr. N. very serious together in a close walke. I tooke noe notice I saw them, butt wentt on to the place apointed; and while I was walking there I began to consider that itt fell outt well I had nott mett with Mr. N. alone, for hee that had already injured mee so much might possibly allledge that I had prevailed with him to take that upon him hee had never saied only to conceal my guilt, and soe I might still bee thought what hee first represented mee. Therefore I resolved to propose itt to my Lady H. when shee came, to goe together where Sr Ch. and hee was walking, and there speake of itt to him before them. Shee aproved of my reason and resolution, and said itt was very likely hee might make such a use of itt. And that this way would bee more satisfaction to her then ye other. So wee went together to ye close walke where Sr Ch. and hee was walking together. (By the disorder I saw him in, I knew Sr Ch had given him some hint of what was amongst us, and ye reason hee gave his Lady and I afterwards was, because hee had nott a mind to have him too much surprised, and knew ye that meeting would nott bee for his advantage.) "Mr. N. (said I,) you could nott butt have observed a great strangenenshe from my Lady H. to mee a good while, and beeing noe longer able to suffer itt I have presed to know ye reason; and beeing informed of itt, I know itt is in your power to make the reconcililtaion, and therefore I expect itt from you." "Truly, Mrs. M. (replied hee,) I shall bee very glad to bee an instrumentt in so good a worke." "Then (said I,) Mr. N. doe you nott remember that day you came from Carlile you told mee of a person that informed you my lady was jealous of mee?" "Nooe indeed, (said hee,) I remember noe such thing:" "Itt is impossible (I replied,) your memory can be so ill; butt to make itt better I will beg leave of Sr Ch. and my lady to whispers the person in your care that you named, because I desire nott to disobleige him with this contest." They both gave leave, and I whispered softly, "Did nott you tell mee Mr. C. told you, and you were shure hee had itt from his wife, and so you could nott doubt the truth of itt?" "I remember indeed (said hee,) that I told you your cariage was such that if you did nott mind itt you would give my lady occasion to bee jelouse." I lifted up my eyes and hands to heaven, and said, "Good God! hath this man the confidence to say this?" I turned to Sr Ch. and my lady, and then repeated severall things allready mentioned, wherein hee had condemned my Lady and magnified mee to a high degree of flattery. And I said, "I confess it is a great disadvantage I have to contest with such a person whom there is much more reason should bee beleived then I; but Sr you are a Justice of Peace, and therfore may lawfully take my oath, and I will most solemnely give it upon the Bible that hee did say these things to mee, and insisted offten on them, and diswaded mee offten when I was resolved to have justified my selfe to your lady." "And I (replied hee,) will take my oath upon the same Bible that itt is nott true shee says." My admiration was such to heare him speake att y\textsuperscript{e} rate, that I was allmost strucke dumbe, and all I said more was very calmly, "Mr. N. you have made more use of ye Bible than I have done, and therfore perhaps thinke you may bee bolder with itt; butt I would nott sweare your oath to have Sr C. estate." Hee would have insisted; butt Sr Ch. and his lady interrupted him, and desired there might bee noe more of itt. I said I could say noe more then what I had offred, and I left my part to bee made evident\textsuperscript{b} by the great and holy God who knew how I was wronged, and to him I did referre myselfe, who I knew would doe mee right. My Lady and I then wentt in, and Sr Ch. followed us. And when wee were together, every one freely gave accountt what caracter hee had given of us. My Lady and I hee had most equally balanced together; for whatever ill he had said of mee to her hee had said as much of her La\textsuperscript{e} to mee. And as hee indeavored to poses mee with the opinion of her beeing jelouse, so hee perswaded her that shee had reason for itt by my beeing desperately in love with Sr Ch. Sr Ch. laughed att this discourse, and said, "Hee hath beene so wise as nott to have much of this to mee; only once hee said that hee was sure you were in love with mee, and I could nott butt perceave itt; and I told him as I was an honest man I had never seene anything like itt." "Well, (said I,) then itt seemes in this hee had something of justice y\textsuperscript{t} hee had a mind I should thinke as well of you in gratitude as hee would have your thoughts beene of mee, for hee gave you high comendations, and one of your excellentt qualitys was that you had a great value for mee, wch I did then and shall still acknowledge I have receaved much more civilitys from you then I deserved, yet noe more then I might expect from any civill person in there owne howse who loved there lady, and for her sake would oblige those shee loved. Itt was, Sr, (continued I,) upon this accounttt that I both receaved and returned what you gave and I paid. And now, before your lady, I conjure you by all the hopes you have of hapinesse here or hereafter, and as you would avoid all the curses threatned to dissemblers, freely declare what I have ever done or said since I came within your familly that might confirme you of Mr. N. opinion of mee." Hee most solemnly declared hee never saw noe ground for itt, and that that was the first thing wch made him apprehend Mr. N. nott beeing what hee should bee by the contrediction hee saw in that. There was nothing more contributed to vindicate mee then the disorder wch from that day apeared in Mr. N.; for itt was visible to the meanest in the howse, though few knew the reason of itt, because Sr Ch. had a respect for him, and desired all should respect him, and therfore did as much as could bee to conceale what had beene amongst us.

Some time afther this the Sacrementt was to bee celebrated in the chapell, and I had many debates with my selfe what to doe. Att last, beeing resolved, I sentt for Mr. N. to my chamber, and told him itt was not withoutt great disputes in my thoughts of the good and ill of partaking or leaving that holy mistery that had made mee send for him; and though hee had injureed mee beyond a posibility of beeing forgiven by any as a woman, yett as a christian I forgave him; and though hee had wronged mee, yett I would nott wrong my selfe by wanting yt benefit which I hoped for and did expect in that blessed participation. "This (said I,) I thought fitt to tell you that you may nott thinke I goe for coustume or formality, butt with a sence of both my duty and advantage, and lett nott my charity make you thinke litle of yr fault, for withoutt great repentance great will be your judgement." Hee aproved much of my charity, and would have said something to vindicate himself; butt I interrupted him, and desired him to consider what hee was going aboutt, and that itt would aggravate his guilt to thinke to justify himselfe, since noe excuse could bee made. I instanced that particular that was an undeniable fault, w^ch was his going immediatly from mee to tell my Lady Howard that I had as a secrett told him I was maried. "How can I butt suspect (said I,) the truth of all you speake outt of the pulpitt, when you devulged that afster such solemne engagementts of secrety which I only said for a triall of your fidelity." "O! (replyed hee,) if you knew what temptation I had to make that discovery, you would forgive mee." "Itt was only to tell you that (said I,) that I sentt for you, and againe I repeat itt that I doe forgive you, and pray God to make you penitentt for your sin, that so you may obtaine mercy, and that y^r taking the holy sacramentt may nott bee for your greater condemnation. And this is all I have to say to you." So hee left me.

Afster the solemne time of our devotion was over, I began seriously to think what way to dispose of myself; for, though Sr Ch. and his lady were returned to there former kindness, yett I thought itt nott fitt to stay where I had beene so injuriously traduced. Therfore to leave that familly I was fully resolved, butt where to goe I could nott determine.

In all this time I had never heard nothing of C. B., nor from him; w^ch had beene trouble enough to mee, had itt nott beene overcome by the presentt trouble I was in, w^ch made mee unsencible of what was att a greater distance. Butt noe sooner was I delivered from y^e sadness and discontentts occasioned by what I have now related, then a new misfortune arives. When I was hardly well composed afster one storme another rises, w^ch by the danger of others involved mee by sympathy and gratitude in great disturbance. My sister writtes me a long letter full of passion and discontentt, informing mee that a cosen of her husband's, an heire to whom hee was to succeed, was stolen away, and that afster much inquiry hee heard that y^e gentleman who had stolen her away had caried her to Flanders, and that shee had fled to a monestary to secure her selfe till my brother could come there to receive her. And unhappily in the same ship that hee wente over in C. B. was a passenger. And though hee was disguised, yet my brother knew him, and as soone as they landed hee challenges him. They chose their seconds, sights, and my brother was wounded in the hand so dangerously, that to loose the use of itt was the least that was expected. How sadly this surprised mee is nott to bee imagined, for I should have been concerned in his misfortune though a stranger had occasioned itt. Butt to thinke itt was upon my accountt, and done by one I was interested in, these considerations did highly agravate my trouble, and make mee conclude the same as my sister did in her letter, that I was the most unhapy person living, for I had nott only made my selfe so, butt brought misfortune upon all that related to mee. Yett in the midst of all these disconsolations, I cannott butt acknowledge I had a sattisfaction to know so worthy a person as my brother N. owned a concerne for mee, whic hee would never have done (I was assured) if hee had beleived mee vicious.
Within a little while after, C. B. sentt an expresse to mee, who was one of the persons who had assisted him in his escape, and could therefore give mee a true account of itt, and where hee was concealed till ye unhapy time of the encounter betwixt my brother N. and him.
C. B. knew very well I could nott butt heare of itt, and that itt would very much afflict mee, and therefore hee writt a long letter in his owne vindication, and lest I should have a doupt of what hee said, he refferred the confirmation of itt to an inclosed letter directed to mee, written by the two seconds, and subscribed by them both, who had beene two colonells in the king's army. My brother's second I cannott for the presentt remember his name, butt C. B. 's second was Coll Loc (who afterwards came into Scotland with the King).
The account they gave was this. When they were all fowre in the place apointed and there doubletts off, C. B., with his sword in his hand, came to my brother N. and told him hee was never ingaged in any imploymeat more contrary to his inclination than to make use of his sword against him who drew his in the deffence of the person hee loved beyond any living. That hee knew nott butt what hee was going now to say might bee ye last that ever hee should speake, and therfore as such hee desired to bee beleeed. Hee said hee did beleewe there was nott a more vertuous person in the world then I, nor did hee know his wife was living, and as this was true so hee desired the Lord to blese him in what hee was going aboutt.

So they fight, and had severall passes without advantage to either, butt my brother receaving a wound in his hand and bleeding fast, the seconds ran in and parted them, C. B. extreamly regretting what he had done, and my brother seeming to be sattisfied that hee had nott gott itt unhandsomely. This in short was the substance of there relation, w^ch they concluded with a great complement to mee.

Though I never aproved of duells, yett if my prayers were heard for my brother's recovery I thought this would nott bee to my disadvantagge.

Butt that w^ch pleased mee most was that C. B. had mett with my Lord Dunfermeline in Flanders (who, with other Commissioners were sentt from Scottland to invite his Majesty home), and aquainuting his Lor^p. with what had beene betwixt him and mee, and justified himselfe as to what reports had beene made to his disadvantage, to obleige both him and mee, the Earle of Dunfermeline wrritt very earnestly to desire mee to come into Scotland, where the King intended to bee shortly, and therefore hee thought that would bee the most convenient time for mee to come, when I would have many freinds to asist mee for the recovery of my portion w^ch was in Scotch hands. C. B. seconded this with many arguments to perswade mee to hasten my journey all that was posible while the road was cleare, for there was reason to apprehend that Cromwell would soone march thither with the Army when hee heard the King was landed.

I showed my Lady H. my letters, and my resolution of obaying them; but my deficulty was how to undertake the journey, or live in a strange place, having litle or noe mony. Butt as to that my Lady H. very generously said I need nott trouble my selfe, for I should nott want what mony I desired, nor horses and men to attend mee to Edenborough. I was nott then long determining of the day for my departure. And Sr Charles apointed an old gentleman, a kinsman of his owne, with others, to bee ready to conduct mee (and shee that served mee) att the time prefixed.

The night before I was to come away I sentt for Mr. X. and told him hee should now have his desire in seeing mee outt of the house, wch was what hee had used many unhandsome ways to bring aboutt; and had itt nott beene for him itt is possibe I had left that house with more regrett. Now I was likely to bee att a great distance from him, and therefore might expect hee would bee the more liberall in his discourse of mee when I could nott vindicate myselfe.

"Butt (said I,) remember when ever you speake any thing to my dis-advantage you are heard by the Allmighty God, who will plead for mee, and your owne conscience (if you have one) will condemne you, for you know I am innocent of those unworthy things you charged mee with."

"I confess (replied hee,) there hath some unhapy circumstances fallen outt that may seeme to give you reason for what you say. Butt I must suffer rather than vindicate myselfe to the prejudice of those under whose roofe I dwell; butt if ever I am so happy as to see you outt of this familly, I shall then lett you see how much you have beene mistaken of mee, and to evidence what my thoughts are of you, I will give itt you under my hand that I do beleve you as vertuous a person as lives."

I smiled att that, and with a disdainefull looke told him my vertue would have butt a weake suport if I had nothing to uphold itt butt a testimony from him.

"Noe, (said I,) I have a better hand to rely upon to defend mee, and such a one as will make you ashamed for what you have done, except you repentt. The respect I have to your calling, and the benefit I have had by your preaching and prayer, shall keepe mee from devulging your faults; butt, as you expect the Lord's blesing upon your ministeriall office, and would avoid the beeing a scandall to itt, leave off the course you have begun with mee; lest iff you practise itt on any other itt may bring to remembrance ye injury you have done mee, and so aggravate your future crime." After I said this I left him, and gave my Lady H. account of what I had said to him.

The next day I took my leave of my Lady and all the family, and S'r Ch. with a good attendance went part of the way; and none in the family but gave some evidence of there concerne in parting from me except Mr. N., who hardly went to the gate with me, and for that was much censured by all, especially my Lady H. who had great expressions of kindnese to me, and said if that journey proved unhappy to me it would bee a trouble to her as long as she lived, because she was sure I had never undertaken it so willingly if I had not been disobligeed where I was. I could not contradict so great a truth, nor be unsencible of her very great friendship, which was the more to be valued because it had mett with so strong a tryall, and yet continued firm.

The second night after I left N. Castle (Thursday, 6 June, 1650,) I came to Edenborough, and lodged at Sainders Peeres, at the foot of the Canongate. I had discharged all that were with me to tell my name to any one till I could find out some that I had formerly known in England. That night at supper, the old gentleman being with me and the Mrs of the house, and sitting fast against me, I could not but looke earnestly upon her, and I said, "Mrs. I cannot but have a kindnese for you, because you have a very great resemblance of my mother." At that she clapt her hands, and said, "Nay, then, I will never inquire any more who you are, for I am sure you are Will Murray's sister, for hee often told mee ye same." She then informed me of a kinsman of my mother's (who shee made her executor) that had beene at her house that day, and shee knew hee would be glad to see me. And I was well pleased to hear of him, and sent for him to advise whether I should continue where I was or take a more private lodging. But hee told mee it was a very civill howse, and ye best quality lay there that had not howses of there owne.

When the gentleman and those that came with mee had rested some time, and scene the towne, they returned back againe with all the acknowledgements I was capable to make to Sr Ch. and his lady for there great civility and kindnese.

When I had beeene two or three days in the towne I receaved a visit from the Earle of Argile, who invited mee to his howse, and the next day sentt his coach for mee, wch I maid use of to waite upon his lady. When I came up staieres I was mett in the outward roome by my Lady Anne Campbell, a sight that I must confesse did so much surprise mee that I could hardly beleive I was in Scottland, for shee was very handsome, extreamely obleiging, and her behavuer and dress was equall to any that I had seen in the Court of England.
This gave mee so good impresions of Scottland, that I began to see itt had beeene much injured by those who represented itt under another caracter then what I found itt. When I was brought in to my Lady Argile I saw then where her daughter had derived her beauty and civility; one was under some decay, butt the other was so evident and so well proportioned, that while shee gave to others shee reserved what was due to her selfe.

Aftar I had staid a convenientt time I returned home to my lodging, where, amongst severall persons that visitted mee, Sr James Dowglas came and earnestly invited mee to Aberdour to stay some time with his Lady. Itt was too obleiging an offer to refuse, and upon the 15. of June I wentt with him, and crosed att Leith to Brun Island. As soon as I landed, Sr James Dowglas had mee by one hand and the Laird of Maines by the other, and they bid mee wellcome to Fife, and imediately I fell flat downe upon the ground, and said, "I thinke I am going to take posession of itt." They blamed one another for having had so little care of mee; butt what I thought then accidentall I have since looked upon as a presage of ye future blesings I injoyed in Fife, for wch I shall for ever blesse my God, and the memory of that prostration shall raise in mee praise to the Lord of bounty and mercy while I live.

When I came to Aberdour I was led in through the garden, wch was so fragrant and delightfull that I thought I was still in England.
I intended to have staid there butt 2 or 3 nights, butt they would nott part with mee till the 22. of June, and then I returned to Ed., butt wth a promise to bee backe againe, wth I made good the 27. day.

Aboutt this time the news came that the King was landed in the North, and was comming South. I began to reflect upon my owne misfortune in ye unhappy report that was of C. B. wife's beeing alive, and itt was knowne to severalls aboutt the Court what my concerne in him was; this, with the unhandsome and unjust caracer given both to him and my brother Will, made mee apprehend might make mee nott bee so well looked upon by the King as otherways I might expect. And therfore, to informe my selfe what reception I should gett, I sentt an expresse to Mr. Seamar, who was one of the grooms of the Bed Chamber, who had beene fellow servantt with my brother Charles, and to him I writt representing the disadvantages I lay under, and that I expected his friendship in advising mee whether I should goo to kisse the King's hand or forbearre, for I had much rather wantt ye honor y" receave itt with a frowne. To which this was his answear, dated from Faulkland, the 17. of July 1650:

"I shall have only time to tell you that his Matie saith that you shall bee very wellcome to him when soever you will give your- selfe that trouble, and that the world is too full of false rumours easily to ingage his beleefe in any thing that shall bee to your prejudice; and I am very confident, when you have spoken wth him, you will rest as assured of the esteeme that he hath of you as that I am, upon all ocuations, your very humble servantt,

I was much sattisfied with this letter; and now my greatest concerne was to find outt a convenientt time and place where to performe my duty; butt I was soone putt outt of that dispute by the Countess of Dunfermeline, who came to Aberdour to see her brother and his lady, and then told mee shee had receaved a letter from her lord aquainting her what day the King had determined to bee at Dunfermeline (where his lordship had invited his Majic), and injoyned her to give mee an invitation to bee there that day, as knowing noe place in Scotland I had more interest in, nor fitter for mee then there to attend the King. My lady was pleased to second her lord's desire with soe many obleiging expressions that I could nott in civility have denied to obay her commands, though itt had beene contrary to my inclination; butt knowing itt both my honour and advantage to be presented to the King in that noble familie, I acknowledged the offer for a very great favor, and promised to wait upon her Ladie the day apointed; which I made good by the assistance of S^ James D. who wentt along with mee, and wee came to Dunfermeline some three houres before the King's arivall.

After his Majic had beene some time in ye bed-chamber reposing after the journy, I waited upon my Lady Dunfermeline and my Lady Anne Areskine to kisse the King's hand, beeing introduced by my Lord Argile and other persons of honour; and the first person I saw in ye bed-chamber was one of them who my brother Will had told mee was his enemy. I cannott butt acknowledge I was att first disordered when I saw him, and ye more that hee putt a question to mee to answere w'th I was obleiged either to dissemble or say what was very unfitt for the King to heare; butt I avoided both with that reason, because I was so neere, for the King heard my answear and smiled. When I recollected the promise I had made my brother to forgive that person, and never to quarrell with him for the injury hee had done him, I so farre made itt good that I had an opertunity ye with much ease and unknowne I could have had him putt from ye court att that time when many were dismissed that had come home with ye King; for a person who had great influence upon those who then governed inquired of mee particularly concerning him, of whom I gave so favourable a cararacter that hee was continued to attend his Majic.

During the time the King continued at Dunfermeline, w'th was 8 or ten days, beeing royally intertained by the Earle of Dunfermeline, and all those who attended his Majic, every day I waited upon my lady and her niece when they went to attend the King either att dinner or super; and though att those times hee was pleased to looke favorably upon mee, yett itt was noe more then what hee did to strangers. This did much trouble mee; and therfore the day before the King was to goe from Dumsermeline I sentt for Mr. Harding in the morning to my chamber, and told him, though my aquaintance with him was butt of a short date, yett for the friendship I heard hee had for my brother Charles, who was his fellow servantt, I made choice of him whose age and experience might make more sensible (of what I could nott butt regrett) then those whose youth made them unconcerned in any trouble that was nott there owne. I then vindicated my brother Will from the aspersion hee lay under, and wth I am confidentt occasioned his death; and represented my owne misfortune, wth posibly I might have avoided if I had nott ingaged in serving his Highnese the Duke of Yorke in his escape, many circumstances attending that having contributed to my presentt suffering both as to my fame and fortune: for, beeing necessitate to leave London for my owne security, itt was easy for the malicious to deprive mee of both when I was nott in a capacity to speake in my owne defence. " And after all this (said I,) itt is an agravation of my trouble to see the King never take notice of mee, wth may bee a great discouragementt to those persons of honor who have beeene very civill to mee to continue so when they see mee so litle regarded by his Matie." I could nott utter this without teares, in wth the good old gentleman did keepe mee company, expresing a very great respect for mee, and promised to speake to the King, and give an accountt of what I had said.

The next day, presenttly after the King had dined, when his Matie had taken leave of my Lady Dumsermeline and given her a complemtt and my Lady Anne Areskine (her lord's niecee), hee came to mee and said, "Mrs. Murray, I am ashamed I have been so long a' speaking to you, butt itt was because I could nott say enough to you for the service you did my brother; butt if ever I can command what I have right to as my owne, there shall bee nothing in my power I will nott doe for you;” and with that the King laid his hand upon both mine as they lay upon my breast. I humbly bowed down and kist his Majesty hand, and said I had done nothing but my duty, and had recompense enough if his Majesty accepted of itt as a service, and allowed mee his faver. After some other discourse with I have forgot, the King honored mee with the farwell hee had given the ladys, and immediatly wentt to horse.

As soone as the King parted from mee, there came two gentlemen to mee; one tooke mee by one hand, the other by the other, to lead mee outt to the court (where all the ladys wentt to see the King take horse,) with so many flattering expresions that I could nott butt with a little disdaine tell them I thought they acted that part very well in The Humorous Lieutenant, where a stranger comming to see a solemnity was hardly admitted to looke on by those who afterwvards troubled her with there civility when they saw the King take notice of her. This answere putt them both a little outt, and made them know I understood their humour.

To allay the joy that all the loyal party had for the King's returne, there was two great oceations for disturbance, the one beeing strengthned by the other: Cromwell comming in with an army when there was so great devissions both in Church and State, and such unsuitable things proposed for accomodation as I wish were buried in perpetuall silence.

After the King had been invited to severall places and intained suitably to what could bee expected, his Majesty returned againe to Dunfermeline, having ordered ye forces to march; and one morning came letters from ye army lying att Dunbar that they had so surrounded the enemy that there was noe posibility for them to escape, wth news gave great joy and much security. Butt the sad effects made us see how little confidence should bee placed in any thing butt God, who in his justice thought fitt to punish this kingdom and bring itt under subjection to an Usurper, because they paid nott that subjection that was due to there lawfull King. The unexpected defeat wth the King's army had at Dunbar putt every one to new thoughts how to dispose of themselves, and none was more perplexed than I where to goe or what to doe. Againe my Lady Dunfermeline invited mee to goe North with her La^p., assuring mee of much welcome and that I should fare as shee did, though shee could nott promise any thing butt disorder from so sodaine a removall to a howse that had nott of a long time had an inhabitanttt. I had much reason to accept of this offer with more than an ordinary sence of God's goodnesse; for there could nott have beene a more seasonable act of generosity than this to a stranger that was destitute of all meanes that should assist mee in a retreat. I sentt my woman over to Ed., and writ to a lady who I had knowne from my infancy att London, and another letter to the gentleman who was my mother's executor, and from both I desired to borow what mony they could conveniently spare. I named the sum I desired from the lady, w^ch shee very friendly sentt upon the note of my hand; butt my cousin excused himselfe, because hee had itt nott of his owne, butt said hee had spoken to Sr G. S. who had promised to lend mee 25l. sterling upon my note, which hee made good, and then I was the better sattisfied to waite upon my Lady Dunfermeline to the North, when I was provided so with mony as that I should bee the less troublesome to her La^p.

1650. Upon Satturday the 7. of September wee left Dunfermeline, and came that night to Kinrose, where wee staid till Monday. I cannottt omit to insert here the opertunitty I had of serving many poor wounded soldiers, for as wee were riding to Kinrose I saw two that looked desperately ill, who were so weake they were hardly able to goe along the high way; and inquiring what ailed them, they told mee they had beene soldiers att Dunbar, and were going towards Kinrose if there wounds would suffer them. I bid y^m when they came there inquire for y^c Countess of D. lodging, and there would bee one there would dresse them. Itt was late itt seemes before they came, and so till y^c next morning I saw them nott, butt then they came attended with twenty more, and betwixt that time and Monday that wee left that place I believe threescore was the least that was dresed by mee and my woman and Ar. Ro. who I imployed to such as was unfitt for mee to dres; and besides the plaisters or balsam I aplyed I gave every one of them as much with them as might dres them 3 or 4 times, for I had provided my selfe very well of things nesesary for that imployment, expecting they might bee usefull. Amongst the many variety of wounds amongst them two was extraordinary: one was a man whose head was cutt so that the (blank) was very visibly scene, and the watter came bubbling up, wth when Ar. R. saw hee cried outt, "Lord have mercy upon thee! for thou art butt a dead man." I seeing the man who had courage enough before begin to bee much disheartened, I told him hee need nott bee discouraged with whatt hee that had noe skill said, for if itt pleased God to blese what I should give him hee might doe well enough; and this I said more to harten him up than otherways, for I saw itt a very dangerous wound; and yett itt pleased God hee recovered, as I heard afterwards, and wentt frankly from dresing, having given him something to refresh his spiritts. The other was a youth aboutt 16 that had beene run through the body with a tuke. Itt wentt in under his right shoulder and came outt under his left breast, and yett [he] had litle inconvenience by itt; butt his greatest prejudice was from so infinit a swarme of creatures that itt is incredible for any that were nott eye-wittneses of itt. I made a contribution and bought him other cloaths to putt on him, and made ye fire consume what els had beene unposible to destroy. Of all these poore soldiers there was few of them had ever beene drest from the time they receaved there wounds till they came to Kinrose, and then itt may bee imagined they were very noisome; butt one particularly was in that degree who was shott through the arme that none was able to stay in ye roome, butt all left mee. Accidentially a gentleman came in, who seeing mee (nott without reluctancy) cutting off the man's Sleeve of his doublet, wth was hardly fitt to be toughted, hee was so charitable as to take a knife and cutt it off and fling [it] in ye fire.

When I had dresed all that came, my Lady D. was by this time ready to goe away, and came to St Johnston that night, where the King and Court was. My La. A. A. and I waited upon my Lady into her sister the C. of Kinowle, and there my Lord Lorne came to mee, and told mee that my name was often before the Council that day. I was much surprised, w^ch his Lor^v. seeing kept mee y^ longer in suspense; att last hee smiling told mee there was a gentleman (w^ch it seems was hee that had cutt off the man's sleeve) that had given the King and Councell accountt of what hee had scene and heard I had done to the poore soldiers, and representing the sad condittion they had beene in withoutt y^ releefe, there was presently an order made to apoint a place in severall townes, and chi-rugions to have allowance for taking care of such wounded soldiers as should come to them. And the King was pleased to give mee thanks for my charity. I have made this relation because it was the occasion of bringing mee much of the devertissements I had in a remotter place.

Upon Thursday night the 19. of September my Lady Dunferme-line kist the King's hands, and tooke leave of all her relations in St Johnston to goe on her journey to Fivye. The first night wee lay att Glames, the next two nights att Brighon, upon Monday night att Donotter, the next night att Aberdeene, where wee staid till Friday the 27., and that night came to Fivye, where I was intertained with so much respect and civility both by my Lady Dunfermeline and my Lady Anne Ariskene, and the whole familly, that I shall ever acknowledge itt with all the gratitude imaginable.

After I had beene there some time the King came to Aberdeene, and my Lord D. came home for a weeke to see his Lady, and told mee that S^r G. S. had desired his Lordship to lett mee know that some friends of his was to present the King with a purse with gold, and if I would imploy any that I had interest in to speake to the King for mee, hee doubted nott butt his Ma^tie would give mee part of the presentt. When my Lord returned I writt of itt to Mr.
Seamor, and att the first proposall the King was pleased to give order for sending fifty pieces to me. Half of it I paid to the gentleman that had formerly lent it to me, who had found this way to secure himselfe and oblige me, and so I was free of that debt to my very great satisfaction.

I had not been long enjoying the tranquility of that retired condition I was in when I received a letter from C. B. that he was att Aberdeene, and desired to know if he might have liberty to come and see me at Fivye. I was altogether averse to it, and used many arguments to dissuade him from it, being positively determined not to see him till he could free himself of what he was taxed with; for, though I did not believe it, and that he had so fully satisfied my Lord Dun. in Holland that his Lord (as he often told me) had not the least doubt of it, yet I thought the safest way was to keep at a distance till it was past dispute. He so often importuned me that at last he prevailed, and, having acquainted my Lady Dunfermeline with his desire, and obtained her Lady's liberty, I gave my consent; but while the question was in debate the King returned towards Sterling, and he attending (as the rest did) his Ma'ie, it took up a considerable time before my answer could come to him, and he came to Fivye. But after I had despatched his foot-boy I began to have great debates with myself, and the conflict betwixt love and honor was so great and prevalent that neither would yield to other, and betwixt both I was brought into so great a distemper that I expected now an end to all my misfortunes; but it seems the Lord had some further use for me in the world, and therefore thought it fitt then againe to spare me. What ye trials were that I met with under that sickness are knowne to some yet living, and the submission under them was, I hope, acceptable to him that gave it.

Before I recovered so much strength as to be able to sit up, C. B. came, whose satisfaction in seeing me was much abated to find me so weak, and for seeming so doubtful of the reports concerning him; and since what he had said to my brother N. (when he thought it might have beene the last moment of his life,) did not satisfy mee, hee offered to take the most holy sacramentt upon itt that hee was innocent if itt should bee true that his wife was living, and gave so many reasons why itt should nott bee true that I could nott butt acknowledge pleaded much for him. I altogether disallowed of making use of that sacred institution for the end hee proposed, since I did nott thinke itt warrantable, nor could itt convince mee of the untruth of the report, though itt might confirmhe was innocent of itt; and that charity inclined mee to beleve, for hee could expect noe advantage with mee to countervaile the contrivance of so ill a designe; and I thought noe person could bee so ill as doe what's sinfull merely because itt is a sin, and therfore I concluded either the report false, or hee miserably abused as well as I. Afther hee had staid two nights hee tooke his leave of mee, having assured mee ever to keepe a due distance with him till the truth were evident beyond any one's contrediction; and if I found hee had been injured, hee might bee confident noe other missfortune under heaven should separate mee from him when ever I found I might lawfully and conveniently make good what I had designed.

Itt would bee too tedious to relate here how I spentt ye time I was att Fyvie, wth was neere two yeares; butt itt was so agre-ably that in all my life I never was so long together so truly contented; for the noble familly I was in dayly increased my obligation to them, and the Lord was pleased to blese what I gave to the helpe of the sicke and wounded persons came to mee, part of them from Kinrose; and some English soldiers came to try my charity, wth I did nott deny to them, though they had itt nott without exhorting them to repent there sin of rebellion and become loyall. The variety of distempered persons that came to mee was nott only a devertismentt, butt a helpe to instruct mee how to submit under my owne crosses, by seeing how patient they were under thers, and yett some of them intollerable by wanting a sence of faith, wth is ye greatest suport under afflictions. There was three most remarkeable of any that came to mee: one, Isbell Stevenson, who had beeene three yeare under a discompoed spiritt; the other was a young woman who had been very beautiful, and her face became loathsomely deformed with a cancerous humour that had overspread it, which deprived her of her nose and one of her eyes, and had eaten much of her forehead and cheeks away; the third was a man that had a horne on the left side of the hinder part of his head, betwixt 4 and 5 inches about and two inches long, and his wife told mee shee had cutt the length of her finger off (as shee usually did) when two or three days before hee came to mee, because the weight of itt was troublesome. A further account of these may bee had hereafter iff itt bee nesesary.

The misfortune in the King's affaires gave his enemys the greater advantage, and was a discouragement to the loyall party to see how succesfull Cromwell's army was, who now marched where they pleased, and gave laws to the whole kingdome. The Earle of D. beeing left behind the King (when his Majesty marched into England) with others of the Councell to order what was fitt to be done in his Majesty's absence, they were soone putt from acting any thing, and was forced to suffer what they could nott preventt. Butt as long as they had any retreat they still retired to bee outt of there enemys hands; and my Lord D. came to Fyvie, and when the Army came to Aberdeene hee wentt to Muray till hee could make some capitulation for himselfe; for when noe resistance could bee made, the next remedy was to make as good condittions as every one could for themselves.

The Army comming now towards Fyvie, some scattering soldiers came in there who had noe officer buttt one they made amongst themselves, and called him Major. When they came into the howse they were very rude, beating all the men came in there way, and frightening the weemen, and threatening to pistoll who ever did nott give what they called for. My Lady Dunfermeline, beeing then great with child, was much disordered with feare of their insolence, and with teares in her eyes desired mee to goe and speake to them, to see if I could prevaiile with them as beeing their country woman, butt (says shee,) I know nott well how to desire itt, because I heare they say they are informed there is an English woman in the howse, and if they get her they will be worse to her then any.
"Madam, (said I,) if my going to them can doe your La$ service, I will take my hazard, and had gone to them before, butt that I thought itt nott fitt for mee in your La$ howse to take upon mee to say any thing to them till I had your La$ command for itt." Then calling my woman I wentt downe where they were, and being instructed which was the major (as they called him), who ordered ye rest as hee pleased (and I belevee gott that authority by humouring them in all they desired), I made my adrese first to him, beleeving if I prevailed with him the rest were soone gained. As soone as I came amongst them, the first question they asked mee was if I were the English whore that came to meet the King, and all sett their pistolls just against mee. (I had armed myselfe before by seeking assistance from Him who only could protect mee from there fury, and I did so much rely upon itt that I had nott the least feare, tho naturally I am the greatest coward living.) I told them I owned myselfe to bee an English woman and to honor the King, butt for the name they gave mee I abhorred itt; butt my comming to them was nott to dispute for my selfe, butt to tell them I was sorry to heare that any of the English nation, who was generally esteemed the most civill people in the world, should give so much occation to be thought barbarously rude, as they had done since there comming into the howse, where they found none to resist them, but by the contrary whatever they called for, either to themselves or horses, was ordered by my Lady to bee given them. "What advantage (said I,) can you propose to yourselves to fright a person of honor who is great with child, and few butt children and weemen in the howse? and if by your disorder any misfortune hapen to my Lady, or any belonging to the familly, you may expect to be called to an account for itt, because I am very confidettt you have no allowance from your officers to be uncivill to any, and I am sure itt is more your interest to oblige all you can then to disoblige them, for the one will make you loved, the other hated; and judge which will be most for your advantage." They heard mee with much patience; and att last flinging downe there pistolls upon the table, the major gave mee his promise that neither hee nor any with him should give the least disturbance to the meanest in the familly, only desired meatt and drinke and what was nesesary that they called for; and they did so keepe there word that my L. Dunfermeline was by there staying in the howse secured from many insolencys that were practised in other places.

A little after there came to Fyvie three regimentts with there officers, beeing commanded by Coll. Lilburne, Coll. Fitts, and Co. Overton. My Lady D. inquired of mee, when shee heard they were comming, if I knew any of those, because shee would desire mee if I did to gett a pass for my Lord D. to have liberty to returne home. I said I had only scene Coll. Fitts when I was at N. Castle, butt had never spoken to him, and if hee owned the knowledge of mee I would then indeavour to serve her La", butt if nott I would speake to those I had never scene rather than him. When they all came up to the dining roome, and saluted my Lady D. and my L. A. Arisken, when Coll. Fitts came to salute mee, hee lifted up his hands as beeing astonished to see mee there, and came to mee with the greatest joy hee could exprese, and taking mee by the hand said to my Lady Dun. "Madam, I must beg liberty to speake with Mrs M. and give her accountt of her freends in England." So hee and I sat downe together att some distance from the rest, and hee gave mee a relation of all y' had hapened in N. Castle after my comming away; some things that I was sory for, even for Mr. N., who itt seemes had nott followed my advice, butt traducing a person (who came there presently after I wentt away) who could nott suffer itt as I had done, butt tooke a revenge suitable enough to the fault, though unsuitable to one of his function. And I cannott omitt to remarke that itt was performed in the garden nott farre from the place where hee so confidently denied a truth, wch I hope, beeing punished there, made him reflect upon his sin and made him penitentt for itt; and I have reason nott only to forgive him, butt to thanke him for the injury hee did mee, since the Lord turned itt to my advantage.
When I found Coll. Fitts thus free and civill, offering mee any service in his power, I told him how much hee would oblige my Lady D., who was now neere her time, if hee would give a pass for my Lord to returne; wth hee promised, and made good when hee came to Elgin, where my Lord was, for hee wentt to him and prevented his Lor's seeking anything by making offer of all hee could desire.

That day the officers wentt away, Coll. Overton sitting by mee at dinner, said to mee that God had wonderfully evidenced his power in the great things hee had done. I replied, noe doupt butt God would evidence his power still in the great things hee designed to doe. I spoke this with more than ordinary earnestnese, wth made him say, "You speake my words, butt nott I thinke to my sence." "When I know y'r sence, (said I,) then I will tell you whether itt bee mine or noe." "I speake (said hee,) of the wonderfull workes that God hath done by his servantts in the late times, that are beyond what any could have brought aboutt withoutt the imediate assistance of God, and his decretion." "Sr, (said I,) if you had nott begun this discourse, I had said nothing to you; butt since you have desired my opinion (wth hee did) of the times, I shall very freely give itt, upon the condition that what ever I say you may nott make use of itt to the prejudice of the noble familly I live in, for I can hold my toung, butt I cannott speake any thing contrary to what I thinke. I cannott butt confess you have had great succese in all your undertakings; butt yt's noe good rule to justify ill actions. You pretend to great zcale in religion, and obedience to God's words. If you can shew mee in all the Holy Scriptures a warrant for murdering your lawfull King and banishing his posterity, I will then say all y'u have done is well, and will bee of your opinion; butt as I am sure that cannott bee done, so I must condemne that horid act, and whatever is done in prosecution of itts vindication." Hee replied, that those who had writt upon the prophesy of Daniell showed yt hee foretold the distruccion of monarky many yeares since, and that itt was a tiranicall governmentt, and therfore fitt to be destroyed. "How comes (said I,) you have taken the power from ye Parliament and those succesive interests that have governed since you wanted the King?" "Because (said hee,) wee found after a little time they began to bee as bad as hee, and therefore wee changed." "And (said I,) so you will ever find reason to change what ever government you try till you come to beg of the King to come home and governe you againe; and this I am as confident of as I am speaking to you." "If I thought that would bee true, (replied hee,) I would repent all that I have done." "Itt will come to that I dare assure you, (said I,) and the greatest hinderance will bee that you thinke your crimes have bee such as is imposible hee should forgive you; but to incourage you I can assure you that there never was any prince more inclined to pardon, nor more easy to be intreated to forgive." "Well, (says hee,) if this should come to pass, I will say you are a prophetess." Here wee broke off, because wee saw the rest of the table take notice of our seriousnes. I found afterwards hee was nott unsattisfied with my discourse, for hee came severall times to see mee when I came to Ed, and remembred many things I had said to him wth I have now forgott.

When the whole kingdome was now brought under the bondage of the Usurper, and finding noe remedy butt to submitt till the Lord thought fitt to give them deliverance, every one thought now of returning where there interest led them; and my Lord Dunfermeline having bee at Fyvie some time, and staid till his lady was delivered of her daughter my Lady Henrietta, and mending againe, his Lor\(^s\) resolved to goe to Ed\(^b\) about his affaires, and I thought itt would bee a convenientt time for mee to returne then with his Lords\(^s\); butt hee having first some occasion to goe to Elgin, my curiosity to see that country made mee prevale wth my Lady Anne Areskine to goe with her uncle, and lett mee waite upon her to Murray. Wee wentt from Fyvie Wednesday the 2nd of June, 1652, and crossed the river Spey att the Boge; upon Friday came backe againe to Garmuth, and crossed there the next day, and came home by Fordie to Fyvie. Though I was resolved of my journey to Eden\(^b\), yett I was much troubled how to performe itt, for my mony was neere spentt, and having beene so long a trouble to my Lady D. I had nott the confidence to seeke to borrow any for carrying mee South. Many difficulyts in ye way represented themselves to mee, and what I might meett with att Edb, and my woman was weeping by mee as beeing much discouraged with the inconveniences shee apprehended I might bee exposed to. I smiled upon her, and bid her have a good hart, for though my pre-sentt condition seemed very darke and cloudy, yett I was confidentt I should see a sun-shyny day, for though I was now incompased round with misfortunes, yett I was very sure I should bee as hapy as I could desire, though I could nott tell wch way itt would come to pase; and for my presentt suplys I would rely upon God, who had never yett left mee in my greatest difficulyts, and to his direction I resigned my selfe, beeing confidently assured hee would provide some unexpected meanes to free mee of my presentt trouble; and with that conclusion I wentt to bed with as quiett repose as if I had had nothing to disturb mee.

The next morning early the midwife (who had come from Dal-keith to my Lady) came into my chamber with her riding-cloaths on to take her leave of mee, and said shee had a request to mee before shee wentt, wch was (hearing that I intended to bee att Edb shortly) that I would doe her the favor to take the mony shee had gott from my Lady and others att the christening, and bring itt South wth mee, because shee durst take noe more with her then her expences by the way because shee apprehended beeing plundered by the soldiers. I told her iff shee thought itt secure with mee, I would doe her that courtesy, and deliver itt where shee would apoint att Edb. So I received itt from her, and gave her a note of my hand for itt, beeing aboutt ten pound sterling, and shee wentt away very well pleased, butt litle knew how much more reason shee had given mee to be so, for I looked nott on itt only as a presentt advantage, butt as a recompense for the reliance I had upon my most gracious God, and an encouragementt still to do so.

Itt was noe wonder if I had trouble to part with the noble familly at Fyvie, where I had beene neere two yeare treated with all the kindnesse imaginable, and where my satisfaction was so great that I could contentedly have spentt the remainder of my life there if itt had beene as convenientt as itt was pleasing. Butt now itt was time to free my Lady of the trouble I had given her so long, and nesesary for mee to goe to Edinb to looke aifter what was my con-erne, and to begin a law suite for recovering ye most considerable part of my portion. So having taken my leave of my Lady and my L. A. Ariskine and all the familly, nott with dry eyes of either side (butt ye teares that moved mee most was from that good old man Mr. George Sharpe, Minister of Fyvie, and his wife, to and from whom I gave and receaved much respect), upon Thursday ye 24. of June, 1652, my Lord Dunfermeline, with his nephew the late Lord Lyon and several other gentlemen, wentt from Fyvie, allowing mee and my woman the honour of there company, and lay that night att my Lord Frazer's att Mohull, the next night att Northwatter brig, a' Saturday night att Belecarese, where wee staid till Tuesday; that night came to Brunt Island; and Wednesday the 30. to Edh, where I wentt to my former lodging att Sainders Speers, and staid there some time till St Robert Muray and his lady came to towne, who lying att the Neither Bow perswaded mee to take a chamber neere them, which was an advantage nott to be refused, having also the conveniency of beeing neerer the place where all my busynese chiefly lay. The lodging they chused for mee was up the stairs by John Meenes shop, belonging to a discreet old gentlewoman, who had a backe way up to the roomes shee used her selfe.

I had nott beene there two or three nights, when, my Lord Dunfermeline and my Lord Belecarese having supt with mee, and gone away aboutt 9 a' clocke, I sate up later than ordinary to write letters to Fyvie with one going there the next morning, and before I had quite done there came soldiers to the chamber doore and knockt very rudely. Att first I made ye noe answare, butt they knockt with that violence that I thought they would have broke up the door, and ye I inquired who they were, and what they would have. They told mee they would come in and see who was with mee, or what I was doing. I told them I knew noe warrantt they had for that inquiry, yett to sattisfy them I assured them there was none there butt myselfe and my woman. They told mee I lyed, and that if I would nott open y° doore they would breake it open. I knew nott what to say or doe, butt I bid Crew (which was my woman’s name) goe and desire the M° of the howse to come downe. They hearing the backe doore open, cried outtt, “Shee hath now lett them outtt att y° backe doore; goe and stope them;” and with that they forced up the doore and run through the roome, and some wentt up staires and some downe the staires, butt finding noe body they came in in a great chafe. I asked them if they had found those they wentt to seeke. They said Noe, for I had lett them outtt. “Gentlemen, (said I,) you may assure yourselves I will complaine of you to your officers, for if I may nottt have liberty in my owne lodging to sitt up and burne a candle as long as I please without having such a disturbance, and upon such unworthy grounds as you would inferre, I thynke few will heare of itt that will nottt condenne your uncivill actions.” They seemed to justify themselves by an order they said they had to breake up any doores where they saw lights affter ten a’ clocke, and that they had beene civill, and expected I would give them something to drinke. I told them when they deserved itt they should have itt; butt sure they could nottt expect itt from mee, having done as much as they could to bring a scandall upon mee that was a stranger newly come there, and theurre might bee the greater prejudice. They saw mee very angry, and that they could nottt prevaille to gett anything, and theurre left mee in disorder enough to thynke what the neibours abouttt might think of mee to heare what they said and did at my chamber doore. The next morning I sentt for W. Muray of Hermiston, who was very great with y° English officers, and desired him to goe to their captaine and complaine, wth hee did, and there captaine sentt downe to referre to mee there punishment, for they had noe allowance for what they did. I soone remitted there punishment, conditionally that they did nottt practice the like againe. The noise of this came to as many persons' cares as I was aquainted with, and the disorder I was in by apprehending itt might bee usuall to have such alarums as long as I lay there, having a great window to the streett, and none in ye howse butt weemen, this made mee thinke of changing my lodging, butt where to fixe I was undetermined, when my Lord Twedale and my Lady very obliegingly off'red mee the use of some roomes in his Lord's howse, they beeing y'n to goe outt of towne, and left only one roome furnished, and a porter to take care of the howse. I accepted of the offer with very great sence of the faver, butt my next deficulty was where to borow or hire furniture for my chamber and my woman's. That wantt was withoutt my seeking supplied by my Lady Belcarese, who very civilly lent mee all necessary accomodations. So I removed my lodging into my Lord Twedale's howse, w'ch I had never had the offer of if the insolency of the soldiers had nott given occation for itt; and so I had an advantage by ye prejudice they intended mee.

After I had beeone some time settled I inquired for Mr. W. II., who was the lawyer who (in my mother's life time had upon her asignation to mee of ye bond of 2000l. sterling, with interest from '47) began the suite in my name against Ar. Hay who was caution for that sum with the E. of Kinowle. A. Hay beeing now dead, I was to proceed against his executors. What the trouble and expense of that pro-cese was is too tedious to relate here, butt in gratitude I shall ever acknowledge the obligation I had to my Lord Newbeth and his father, who I could never perswade to take one peny of mee, and yett they were as ready to asist mee with there advice and attendance to solicitte the judges as they who tooke most from mee. The great disadvantage I had was, that my antagonist was very favourably looked upon by the English judges as beeing inclined to there principles, and they looked upon mee as a Malignantt, and therefore they gave him all the advantage hee could desire against mee, w'ch was by delays, while hee secured himselfe by fraudulent conveyencys of all the mony in good hands, and then they gave mee a decreet for recovering the rest. What I have now related in few words cost mee some yeares attendance. Butt I shall leave what relates to that to mention some other particulars more to my satissfaction.

AfFter I had beene some time at my Lord Tweedale's howse, one Thursday my Lord Dunfermeline came to see mee, and brought a gentleman with him who I had never scene before, and told mee they had beene both dining with my Lady Morton, who was going to Sir John Gilmour's lady's buriall, and had promised to call y^m, and they had only so much time as to come in and aske how I liked my new lodging. I had scarce gieven an answear when one came in to tell mee Mr. D. Dickson was without. I wentt to ye doore to bring him in, butt cheefely to aske one of my Lord D. servantts what gentleman that was with his Lord, who told mee itt was Sr James Halkett. I said, "If hee had nott come with your Lord, I would nott have beene so civill as I am to him, because hee hath a sword aboutt him;" for all the nobility and gentry had that marke of slavery upon them that none had liberty to weare a sword, only such as served there interest and disowned the King, w^ch made mee hate to see a Scotch man with a sword. Mr. Seaton, who I was speaking to, smiled and said I was mistaken, for itt was only a sticke hee held in his hand under his coate, that stucke outtt like a sword, for hee was too honest a gentleman to weare one now. Going in againe and seeing my error made mee change my thoughts of him. Presently afFter word came that my Lady Morton staid in her coach for them at ye doore, and they wentt away. This was the first time I saw Sr Ja. Halkett; butt before Satturday night I had five visitts from him, every time making a severall pretence, either inquiring for Sir Robert Muray or my Ld D., or bringing some commission to mee from my Lady Morton. Hee was cousin german with Sr R. M. and much respected and very intimate with the other, and therefore I could nott butt bee very civill to him upon that accountt; and I saw noe reason butt that hee might challenge itt upon his owne.

AfFter I had beene some time in Ed^b, I had a visittt from one who had frequently beene at my mother's, and was much obleiged to a neere relation of mine, and to them [him?] I told the difficulty I had to get any mony out of England, and the few I had interest in to borow of in Ed\(^p\), and hee very civilly lent mee what paid the mony with the midwife trusted to my care, and for other necessary occasions.

Beeing now settled, and putt my affaires in such hands as would bee carefull of them in my absence, I resolved to goe into England and see my Lady II., having the conveniency of horses lent mee by my Lord Dunfermeline's mother, who was extreamly obligeing to mee, and the more because she knew I was a faithfull servant to all that owned the King's interest, for she was an extraordinary Royallist. Beeing provided with all things for my journy, and intending to goe first to the Fleurs, where I was invited by the Countese of Roxbery, to hasten my journy I receaved a letter from C. B., writt in cipher, giving mee account that after many hazards and difficulties hee was come to the North of England, where hee staid privately till hee could inquire where I was, and that I could advise him where hee might speake with Sr R. Moray. I gave him an answere by the same way I receaved his, and aquainted him with my intention of going to N. Castle, and apointed a day that I intended to bee at Anwicke, where, if hee durst venture to come, I should then lett him know Sr R. Moray's opinion of the fittest place for to meett with him, for I had told Sr R. my designe, and had his aprobation.

When I was come to ye Fleurs, and staid there two or three days, I wentt on my intended journy towards N. Castle; but when I came to Anwicke C. B. diswaded mee from going there, because there was some there that I was not desirous to see, and so I returned backe again the next day and came to the Fleurs, where I staid till Crew came backe, who I sentt to N. Castle to bringe my trunkes and what I had left there for want of conveniency to bring them with my selfe (when I came from thence). The intertainment I had att the Fleurs was so agreeable that I had noe reason to bee weary the time I was there; nor was I unsatisfied to returne to Edḇ, because C. B. was uncertaine how to dispose of himselfe till hee heard againe from mee. I gave Sr R. M. and my Lord D. an accountt of his designs, w'ch was to waite all opertunitys wherein hee might serve the King, and if there were any probability of doing itt in Scottland, hee would then come there and hazard his life as farre as any could propose itt to bee rationall. The advice they gave was to conceale himselfe where hee was for some time till they saw a fitt opertunity to invite him to Edḇ, where they beleved hee might bee secure enough, since hee was knowne to very few there butt such as was his friends. While hee continued in the North of England I heard frequently from him, and still gave him accountt of what hopes or feares there was of acting anything for ye King, which I had the more opertunity to doe because my chamber was the place where Sr Robert M. most commonly mett with such persons as were designing to serve the King. Amongst the rest, Sr James H. seldom missed to be one.

Sr R. M.'s lady beeing great with child, and having noe convenient lodging where shee used to lye, desired some roomes in my Lᵈ. Tweedalls howse, which his Lord. readily granted, to my very great sattisfaction, for I could nott desire the converse of any person more for my advantage; for shee was devoutly good without show or affectation, extreamly pleasing in discourse, civill to all, and of a constant cheerfull humour. Wee allways eate together, and seldom asunder any other part of the day except for convenient retirements; and though that howse was the rendezvous of the best and most loyall when they came to towne, yett none was so constantly there as Sr James H.; and though his relation to Sr Robert was ground enough for his frequentt beeing there, yett any that saw him in my company could nott butt take notice that hee had a more then ordinary respect for mee, which though I thought myself obleeged to him for, yett itt was a great trouble to mee, since I was nott in a capacity to give him such a returne as hee might expect or deserve; and, to preventt his declaring to mee what was visible enough, I resolved to give him an opertunity of being in my chamber alone with mee (\textit{wth} before I had much avoided), that I might put an end to his being further concerned in mee. When hee came in and was sett downe, after some generall discourse, I told him I had beene very much obleiged to his civility ever since I knew him, and I looked upon him as so worthy a person that I could not conceal from him the greatest concerne I had, and my greatest misfortune, \textit{wth} was that when I had ingaged my selfe to a person who I was fully determined to marry, my brother and sister, to diswade mee from it, found noe motive so strong as to indeaver to perswade mee that I was abused in beleevino; his wife was dead, for shee was alive; and because I did rather beleeve him then they, this occasioned there unkindnese. "You may beleeve (said I,) such a report could nott but make me thinke my selfe extremely unhapy; but those whose judgmentts I rely upon more then my owne, as Sr R. M. and my Lord Dun. who hath spoke with him, and are so fully convinced that he is injured, that they chide mee when I seeme to have the least doupt of itt. Now, Sr, (said I,) this relation may confirme I have a great confidence of your friendship when I trust you with this, and doe intend when hee comes here, \textit{wth} I shortly expect, to presentt him to you as one that I hope you will nott beleeve unworthy your knowledge." This discourse did strangely surprise him, butt hee indeavored to hide his disorder as well as hee could, and said hee was sory for my brother's unkindnese, and if hee were neere him hee would indeavour to reconcile him againe (for hee was well aquainted with him when hee was in Scotland), and for C. B. when ever hee came to towne hee would serve him to the utmost of his power, for hee could nott but beleeve hee was deserving, since hee had my esteeme. Presently after this hee left mee, and I expected hee would have laid aside all concerne for mee, butt I soone found my mistake, and that I was in an error when I beleived hee loved mee att an ordinary rate, for itt was never more visible then when hee had least hopes of a recompence, and changed that afection to a vertuous freindsip from \textit{wth} att first hee might have expected a lawfull injoyment.
Some time after this I was advised to write to C. B. to come to Ed.; wch he did as soon as was possible after the receipt of my letter, and had a lodging provided for him and his man in a private house near my Lord Tweedale’s house, where he might come without being seen upon the street. Every night in the close of the evening he came in, and that was the time appointed where those persons met with him who were contriving some means to assert there loyalty, and free there country from continuing enslaved. Those who most frequently met was E. Dunfermeline, Ld Belcarese, St James H. and Sr G. Mackery of Tarbott, who Sr R. Moray had a great opinion of (though he was then very young), and brought him into there caball as one whose interest and parts might make him very useful to there designs. After they had formed it in the most probable way to be successful, they found it necessary to bee armed with the King’s authority for what they did, and therefore sent to acquaint his Majesty with what they intended, and to desire commission for several persons nominate, and some blank for such as might afterwards bee found fitt for the employment. A few days after these letters were sent (the material part whereof was writ in white ink, and what was writ in ordinary ink was only to convey the other without suspicion), Sr G. Mack. came in to dinner to Sr R. M. and told him hee had beene in a stationer’s shop, and, taking up a booke accidentally, the first thing hee saw in itt was direction to writ without being discovered, and there found the same way wch they had beene making use of in there adrese to ye King, which putt them in some disorder; but Sr R. M. said the only hopes hee had was that if that booke came into the English hands, they would not believe any thing so common as to bee in print would be made use of in any busynesse of consequence; butt not long after they receaved an account of there letters comming safe to his Majesty’s hands, and a full complying with there desire in sending the commissions with a safe hand to the North of Scotland, where those persons were to attend there arrivall. In the mean time Sr G. M. was preparing for his journey North, and C. B. was to goe with him under another name, for hee needed noe other disguise, beeing knowne to none in the kingdom but those persons I have mentioned, who was too much his friends and mine to have done him any prejudice. Amongst all his acquaintance none profest more freindship to him then Sr James H. and made it good in all circumstances wherein hee could make it appear, giving him severall presentts usefull for the employement hee was going aboutt, and a fine horse durable for service. C. B. understood very well upon what accountt itt was that he receaved these testimonys of kindness, and did regret the misfortune of nott having itt in his power to oblige him, for hee knew noe thing could doe itt more than his resigning his interest in mee, and that was nott possible for him to doe, though hee would ofttimes tell mee if any thing should arive to deprive him of mee, hee thought in grateitue I was obleged to marry Sr J. H. I could nott butt owne a very great sence of his civilitys, butt nothing could bee more disagreeable to mee then speaking either in jest or earnest of my marrying him, for nothing butt the death of C. B. could make mee ever thinke of another (for what after fell outt I had noe beleefe of, and therfore could nott apprehend itt as a reason for my change).

The day beeing come appointed for Sr G. M. and C. B. departure, some interuption intervened, and therfore itt was delayed for a time. Upon Christmas day [1652] an English woman who had beene a servanett to my Lady Belcarese (Sir R. M. lady's mother), according to ye English coustome, had prepared (in her owne house where shee kept a change) better fare then ordinary, and amongst the rest a dish of mineed pies, of wch when wee were att dinner shee brought over two, and said one shee intended for Sr Ro. and his lady, and the other for Sr J. H. (who was then there) and mee. All the table smiled att what shee said, butt I looked very gravely upon itt, and rather wished itt with him that had more interest in mee. All the company beeing in a better humour then ordinary, wee were all extremely mery. A woman beeing in the house called Jane Hambleton, who they say had the Second Sight, observing all very well pleased, said to my Lady M's woman and mine, "There is a great deale of mirth in this howse today, butt before this day eight days there will bee as much sadnese;" wth too truly fell outt, for within 3 or 4 days my Lady Moray tooke her paines, butt they all struck up to her hart, and all meanes beeing unsuccesfull shee died, with as much regrett as any person could have. Though her patience was as great as was imaginable for any to have upon ye racke, and her love to her husband great as her other qualiffications were, yett shee earnestly desired death many howres before itt came; and Sr R. satte constantly upon her bedside feeling her pulce, and exhorting her cheerefully to indure those momentts of paine wth would soone bee changed to everlasting pleasure. And though noe douht her death was the greatest misfortune could arive to him, yett hee did speake so excellently to her as did exceed by farre what the best ministers said who frequently came to her; and was so composed both att and afster her death, that neither action nor word could discover in him the least of passion. Hee immediately tooke care for transporting her body to Belcarese, to bee bueried there with her child, wth shee caried with her to her grave, beeing never seperated. This was a sad lose to me, for, besides the advantage I had in her obleiging converse, I had the assistance of Sr R. advise in any deficulty in my busynese, and hee wentt offtimes to consultations with mee, and imploied his interest as farre as itt could bee usefull to mee. And when hee wentt away, hee very earnestly recomended mee and my concernes to his cousin Sir J. Halkett, who was nott ill pleased with the imploymett. This for some time putt a stop to Sr G. M. going North, because Sr R. had some thoughts of going with him; wth hee either did, or followed soone afster.

Upon Monday 7. of February, 1652-3, Sr G. M. and C. B. began there journey from Ed. The night before the E. of Dunfermeline supt with him and mee att my chamber, and then ordered the way of keeping coresondence, and what advise hee thought fitt for the action hee was going aboutt. Itt is nott to bee imagined butt my trouble was great to part with him, considering the hazards hee was exposing himselfe to, but I must confess it was increased by reflecting upon what Jane Hambleton had several times said to Crew: that she had observed a gentleman come privately to my chamber, and said she knew that I and severals looked upon him as one I intended to marry, but he should never be my husband. And remembering how truly but sadly fell out what she had foretold before, made me the more apprehensive of this separation, though I was one that never allowed my selfe to inquire or believe those that pretended to know future eventts.

I had of late been so used to good company, that I was the more sensible now of the want of it; and finding it would be more for my advantage to be in some private house, where my meat might be drest, then to have it from the cooks, or keep one for that use, therefore I resolved to take another lodging; and having returned the furniture I borrowed, with my humble thanks for there use and the use of the house, I took two rooms in Mr. Hew Walace house in the foot of Blacke-fryar Wind.

But one remarkeable passage I mett with before I left the Earle of Tweedale’s house, with I cannot but mention. One evening, towards the close of daylight, there came a tall proper man into the roome where I was, and desired hee might speake to mee. I went towards him, and hee told mee hee was one who had not beene used to seeke, but now was reduced to that necessity that hee was forced to aske my charity to keep him from starving. His lookes were so suitable to his words, that I could not but compasionate his condition, and regrett my owne; for all I had was but one poore shilling, nor knew I where to borrow two pence. I thought to give him all I had might apeare vanity if any one should know it, and to give him lesse could not suply his wantt, and therefore I resolved to give it him all, and referred my selfe to His hands for whom I did it (concluding that perhaps some would lend mee yt would nott give him); and I doubted not but God would provide for mee. So I gave him the shilling, which raised so great a joy in him that I could nott but bee highly pleased to bee the instrumentt of that wth brought such praises to the God of Mercy; who left mee nott without a recompence, for the next morning, before I was ready, the Earle of Roxborough came to my chamber, who was newly come from London, and brought mee a very kind letter from my sister, and twenty pound sterling for a testimony of her affection, wth I receaved as a reward for my last night's charity.

To make good the promise Sr J. H. made to Sr R. M. hee never came to towne butt I was the first person hee visitted, and was very solicitous in any of my concerns, and wentt with mee when I had occasion to attend ye Judges. I found frequency of converse increased what I was sory to find, and to devertt it from my selfe I often perswaded him to marry, and used severall argumentts from what hee had aquainted mee with in his owne condition, that made mee by way of freindship to him, and for preventing some inconveniences to his familly, very seriously advise him to marry; and I confese I proposed itt as a great sattisfaction to my selfe to have his condition such as might make itt utterly imposible for him to have any thoughts of mee butt what might bee allowable to him in a married state. I att last prevailed so farre with him, hee acknowlged hee was convinced itt would bee for his advantage to have a good discreet wife, and hee had had severall in his thoughts since I was so urgentt with him, and now was determined upon one, butt was resolved I should bee the first proposer of itt. I was very well pleased to undertake the imploymentt; and the way hee designed was by my recomending him by a letter to my Lord Belcarese, who had an interest in a handsomme young widow, and to desire his Lordp assistance to obtaine his designe. This hee did only to complemntt mee; for his owne interest with my L. B. was much more then any I could pretend to, for hee had a great esteeme for Sr J.; and I remember once when I was att Belcarese (where I wentt frequently), my Lord was speaking something of Sr James, and I said, "Pray, my Lord, give mee leave to aske what the ground was that some people takes to speake with some reflection upon him?" "Truly (my Lord replied,) I beleeve never person was more injured nor worse requited for a gallant action, and hee could nott have desired a better witnese to vindicate him then the King, for hee was a witnese all the time standing upon the leads of my Lord Belmerinoth's house att Leith, and saw the whole proceedure; for, if itt had nott beene for Sr James and those hee commanded, all the King's forces att that time att Muslebrough had beene cutt off; and hee stood in the face of the enemy while the rest retreated, and came handsomely off with very litle disadvantage; and as I am a christian (said my Lord,) this is true; and I have heard the King speake severall times of itt with great aplause to Sr James, and anger att those who traduced him in what was so eminently false.” And upon that occasion hee heard the King say, “Lord keepe mee from there malice! for I see they will spare none they have a prejudice against.”

To confirme that this humour did then very much reigne, I cannott butt mention what I was a witnese of my selfe. One day Sr James came to see mee, and brought a gentleman with him who hee beleived much his freind; and after severall discourses of publique affaires, the gentleman satte sillage a litle while, and then, smiling, said, “Sr James, now that I am convinced you are an honest man, and love the King and his interest, I will make a confession to you. You were so great with my Lord Argile that I thought itt imposible you could bee honest, and therfore I have laine in my bed in a morning inventing some ill story of you, and reported itt when I wentt abroad, and itt was joy to mee to have itt beleived; and, now I see my error, I aske your pardon;” w^th Sr James soone gave, and past itt over as a jest.

Butt to returne where I left. Affter Sr James was resolved to make adrese to that lady, hee intended to goe upon Monday the 21. of March, 1652-3, to Belcarese, and desired to have my letter ready, and in the morning hee would call for itt. I was nott long in writting, and did recomend the designe to my Lord Belcarese with as much earnestnese as the greatest concerne I could have, and had the letter ready against hee came for itt, w^th was punctually ye time When hee came into my chamber, I saw something of joy in his face that I had not observed in a long time; and I said I was glad to see him looke so well pleased, for had hee sooner resolved to goe a wooing, I had sooner scene a change in him. Though I saw him well pleased, yet I saw him in disorder with it, and hee stood still a pritty while withoutt speaking a word. At last hee said, "I have heard news this morning; and, though I know itt will trouble you, yet I thinke itt is fitt you should bee aquainted with itt. Just as I was turning downe Blacke-fryar Wind (said hee,) to come here, Coll. Hay called to mee, and told mee the post that came in yesterday morning had brought letters from London that undouptedly C. B. wife was living, and was now att London, where shee came cheiffely to undeceave those who beleved her dead." "Oh! (said I, with a sad sigh,) is my misfortune so soone devulged?—

unworthy, and in what apeared so, none living could condemn mee more then I did myselfe. Butt I had some circumstances to plead for mee, withoutt wch I had beepe unpardonable, and that was the concealing my intended mariage meerely because hee durst nott withoutt hazard of his life avowedly appeare, and therfore itt had beepe imprudence to pablish what might have beepe (in those times) ruine to us both.

As soone as I could get my selfe composed so as to goe abroad, I wentt where duty led mee more then inclination, for I apprehended every one that saw mee censured mee, and that was noe litle trouble to mee when I reflected on my misfortune that gave them butt too just grounds. Butt that I was with patience to suffer, and whatever els my Lord God thought fitt to infrict, to whom I did entirely submitt, and could make nothing unwellcome from His hand who had so wonderfully suported mee in so unparaleled a triall.

In May 1653 the Earle of Dunfermeline came to my chamber, and told mee hee had gott certaine information that there was a party of horse to bee sentt ye next day to Belcarese, and take my Lord, and bring him prisoner to Edh, wh th hee durst nott wriitt nor communicate to any butt mee; and desired I would goe and lett him know what was designed, that hee might escape; wh I undertooke, and wentt early the next morning, taking only a man with mee (for I was nesesitate to leave my woman to looke after some busynese then fell outt); and the tide falling to bee betwixt 3 and 4 in the morning, and a very great wind, so as few butt the boatmen and myself ventured to goe over, wh contributed well, for I landed safe, and was att Belcarese before ten aclocke; and my Lord and Lady wentt away imediately, and had desired mee to stay in the howse with the children, and take downe all the booke, and convey them away to severall places in trunkes to secure them (for my Lord had a very fine library, butt they intrusted were nott so just as they should have beene, for many of them I heard afterwards were lost). I was very desirous to serve them faithfully in what I was intrusted, and as soone as my Lord and Lady were gone I made locke up the gates, and with ye helpe of Logan, who served my Lord, and one of ye women, both beeing very trusty, I tooke downe all ye booke, and, putting them in trunkes and chests, sentt them all outt of the howse in the night to the places apointed by my Lord, taking a short way of inventory to know what sort of booke were sentt to every person; and with the toile and wantt of sleepe (for I wentt nott to bed that night, and had butt little sleepe the night before), that I tooke the sodainest and the most violent bloudy fluixe that ever I beleve any had in so short a time, wh brought mee so weake in ten days time yt none saw mee that expected life for mee. Butt I forgott to tell that the things had nott beeene two houres outt of the howse when the troope of horse came and asked for my Lord. There officer came up to mee, and I told him my Lord had beeene long sicke, (wh was true enough,) and finding itt inconvenientt to bee so farre from the phisitians, was gone to Edh for his health. They searched all the howse, and seeing nothing in itt butt bare walls and weemen and children, they wentt away. I gave accoutt by an expresse what I said according to there order, and after some few days staying concealed att Ed\textsuperscript{b}, my Lord and Lady went to the North, and from thence went abroad.

I had sentt for my woman, who came the next day after I fell sicke and prest much my sending for a phisitian; butt I knew none butt Dr Cuningham, and I could nott send for him because I knew hee was with my L\textsuperscript{a} Bel., and those phisitians who lived neere Belcarese was nott att home, so I concluded that the Lord had determined now to putt an end to all my troubles, and death was very welcome to mee. Only I beged some releefe from ye violentt paine I had, w\textsuperscript{ch} was in y\textsuperscript{t} extreamitty that I never felt any thing exceed itt. Butt itt seemes itt was only sentt for a triall, and to lett mee find the experience of the renued testimony of God's favor in raising mee from the gates of death. During my sicknese I was much obleged to the frequentt visitts of most of ye ladys thereaboutts, butt particularly the Lady Ardrose; and Mr. D. Forett and Mr. H. Rimer seldome missed a day of beeing with mee. They were both pious good men, and their conversation was very agreeable to mee. As soone as I was able to goe outt and had beene att the church, the Lady Ardroses impertunity prevailed with mee to stay with her a weke before I wentt to Edin\textsuperscript{b}; w\textsuperscript{ch} I did, and then, having taken my leave of all those whose civility to mee made itt necessary, I returned to Ed\textsuperscript{b}; where I had nott beene long before S\textsuperscript{r} J. Halkett came to see mee, who had sentt often to inquire after mee when I was at Belcarese, and excused nott comming himselfe, w\textsuperscript{ch} hee did refraine lest itt should occation discourse of that which hee knew would displease mee. I seemed nott to understand what hee menttt, neither was I curious to bec resolved; only thanked him for what hee had done and what hee left undone, for itt was nott reasonable for mee to expect a visit from him att that distance. From the first day of my acquaintance with him I discovered a particular respect hee had for mee, and I have allready related what way I tooke to preventt ye increase of that w\textsuperscript{ch} could have noe hope of a suitable returne, and yett how obleging hee was to that person who cheefely interupted itt. Now that beeing, as hee thought, removed, I found by many circumstances and indirect words that hee pleased himselfe with what I never had a thought of; though I had beene highly ingrate if I had not had more than an ordinary value for him. Butt lest hee should speake directly to mee of what I knew too well and did regret, hee seldome was with mee that I did not mention my resolution never to marry, and that nothing kept mee from vowing itt butt that I questioned if such vows were lawful. The more hee used arguments to diswade mee from that resolution, I urged the greatest reasons I had to confirme mee in itt; and att this rate wee conversed several months, hee seeking and I avoiding all occasions of his discovering his affection to mee. At last, one day when hee had beene some time with mee speaking of many variety of subjects, when I least expected itt, hee told mee hee could not longer conceal the affection hee had for mee since the first visit hee ever had made mee, and had resolved never to mention itt had my condition beene the same itt was; butt now looking upon mee as free from all oblig-ation to another, hee hoped hee might now pretend to the more favor, having formerly preferred my satisfaction above his owne. I was much troubled att this discourse, with hee could not butt observe; for ye tears came in my eyes. I told him I was sensible that the civillity I had receaved from him were not of an ordinary way of friendship, and that there was nothing in my power that I would not doe to express my gratitude; butt if hee knew what dis-turbance any discourse like that gave mee hee would never mention itt againe, "for as I never propose any thing of hapinesse to my selfe in this world, so I will never make another unhapy, and in this denyall I intend to evidence my respect to you much more then if I intertained your proposall, and therefore I intreat you, if you love either your selfe or mee, lett mee never heare more of itt." "Butt (said hee,) I hope you will not debarre my conversing with you." "Noe, (replied I,) I will not bee so much my owne enemy, and upon the condition you will forbear ever to speake againe of what you now mentioned noe person shall bee wellcomer to mee, nor any will I bee willinger to serve when ever I have oportunity." Hee said itt should bee against his will to doe anything to displease mee, butt hee would make noe promises.

A little after hee desired mee to lett his two daughters stay with mee, for hee designed to bring them to Ed\textsuperscript{b} to learne what was to bee taught there, and if I would lett them stay with mee hee would thinke himself obleiged to mee. I told him I had formerly promised him any service that lay in my power, and hee need nott doubt my performance; and if hee or they could dispence with what intertainementt I could give them hee needed nott doubt of there being wellcome, and itt would bee an advantage to mee to have so good company. His youngest daughter was butt a child, butt his eldest was neere a woman, and even then by more then ordinary discretion gave expectation of what since shee hath made good.

The lodging I was then in nott beeing convenientt for more then myselfe, I removed up to Mr. Glover's, att the head of Blackefriar Wind, where they and there woman came and staid with mee, and wee lived with very much quiett and contentt in our converse, Sr James cumming offten to see them, and bringing many times there unckle and cousin Sr R. Montgomery and Haslehead, who were both extremely civill to mee and frequentt in their visitts.

Itt is so usuall where single persons are offten together to have people conclude a designe for marriage, that itt was noe wonder if many made the same upon Sr James and mee, and the more that his daughters were with mee. Butt I had noe thoughts of what others concluded as done, for I thought I was obleiged to doe all I could to sattisfy him, since I could nott doe what hee cheefely desired. I often desired him to dine and sup with his daughters, wch had bee a neglect if I had omitted, considering hee was often sending provision from his owne howse to them; for hee knew I was nott of humour to take boord, nor did hee offer itt, butt made itt that way equivalentt, nott withoutt trouble to mee, for my inclination was ever more to give then receave.

Towards the winter hee staid most constantly att Ed\textsuperscript{b}, and then grew so impertunate with mee, nott to allow his adrese, butt to give him hopes that itt should bee successfull, that to putt him past all further pursuit I told him I looked upon itt as an addition of my misfortune to have the affection of so worthy a person, and could nott give him the returne hee deserved, for hee knew I had the tye upon mee to another that I could nott dispose of myselfe to any other if I expected a blessing, and I had too much respect to him to comply with his desire in what might make him unhappy and my selfe by doing what would bee a perpetuall disquiett to mee. Hee urged many things to convince mee that I was in an error, and therfore that made itt void; butt when hee saw nothing could prevail, hee desired for his sattisfaction that I would propose itt to Mr. David Dickson (who was one hee knew I had a great esteeme of his judgementt), and rely upon his determination. This I was contentt to doe, nott doupting butt hee would resolve the question on my side.

The first time Mr. Dickson came to mee (wch hee usually did once in a weeke), beeing alone, I told him I was going to comunicate something to him wch hitherto I had concealed, butt now would entrust him with itt under promise of secrecy, and beeing impartially ingenious in giving mee his opinion in what I was to aquaint him with; wch hee promising, I told him I did nott doupt butt hee and his wife and many others in Edv did beleeve Sr Ja.
Halkett's frequentt visitts to mee was upon designe of mariage, and I would avow to him that itt was what hee had oft with great importunity proposed, and had a long time evidencd so reall an affection for mee, that I could nott buttt acknowledge if any man alive could prevale with mee itt would bee hee; butt I had bee so farre engaged to another that I could nott thinke itt lawfull for mee to marry another; and so told him all the story of my beeing unhapily deceaved, and what lengh I had gone, and rather more then les. Hee heard mee very attentively, and was much moved att the relation, wch I could nott make without tares. Hee replied, hee could nott buttt say itt was an unusall tryall I had mett with, and what hee praid the Lord to make usefull to mee. Butt with all hee added that, since what I did was supposing C. B. a free person, hee nott proving so, though I had beene puprickely maried to him and avowedly lived with him as his wife, yet, the ground of itt failing, I was as free as if I had never scene him; and this, hee assured mee, I might rely upon, that I might withoutt offence either to the laws of God or man marry any other person when ever I found itt convenientt; and that hee thought I might bee guilty of a fault if I did nott when I had so good an offer. Hee used many argumentts to confirme his opinion; wth though I reverenced comming from him, yett I was nott fully convinced butt that itt might bee a sin in mee to marry, butt I was sure there was noe sin in mee to live unmarried.

I was very just to Sr James in giving him an accountt what Mr. Dickson had said, though nott till hee urged to know itt. And beeing determined on what hee had offten pleaded, for hee hoped now I would have nothing more to object, I told him, though hee had made apeare lawfull to mee, yett I could nott thinke itt convenientt, nor could I consentt to his desire of marryng withoutt doing him so great prejudice as would make mee apeere the most ungrate person to him in the world. I acknowledge his respect had beene such to mee that were I owner of what I had just right to, and had never had ye least blemish in my reputation (wth I could nott butt suffer in considering my late misfortune), I thought hee deserved mee with all the advantages was posiblle for mee to bring him; butt itt would bee an ill requitall of his civilitys nott only to bring him nothing butt many inconveniences by my beeing greatly in dept, wth could nott butt bee expected, having (except a hundred pound) never receaved a penny of what my mother left mee, and had beene long att law both in England and Scottland, wth was very expencive, and I gave him a particular accountt what I was owing. Yett all this did nott in the least discourage him, for hee would have beene content att that time to have maried mee with all ye disadvantages I lay under; for hee said hee lookt upon mee as a vertuous person, and in that proposed more hapinse to himselfe by injoying mee then in all the riches of the world. Certainly none can thinke butt I had reason to have more then an ordinary esteeme of such a person, whose eyes were so perceptable as to see and love injured vertue under so darke a cloud as incompassed mee aboutt. When I found hee made use of all the argumentts I used to lessen his affection as motives to raise itt higher, I told him since hee had left caring for himselfe I was obligeed to have the more care of him, wch I could evidence in nothing more then in hindring him from ruining himselfe; and therefor told him I would bee ingenious wth him, and tell him my resolution was never to marry any person till I could first putt my affaires in such a posture as that if I brought noe advantage where I maried, att least I would bring noe trouble, and whenever I could doe that, if ever I did change my condition, I thought hee was the only person that deserved an interest in mee. And this I was so fixt in that nothing could perswade mee to allter, wch gave him both trouble and satisfacon by delay and hopes. Many proposalls hee made wherein hee designed to remove my objections, butt though they were great expreions of his affection, yett I would nott admitt of them; butt they had this effect as to make mee the sooner project the putting myselfe in a capacity to comply with his desires, since I found they were unchangeable. And I did resolve as soone as the winter session was done, wcl I expected would putt a close to my law-suite here, I would goe to London, and vindicate my selue from the supos'd guilt I was charged with, and then try what I could perswade my brother to doe in order to the paying what I owed. I aquainted Sr James with my intention, wcl hee aprov'd of, since hee could nott perswade mee to nothing els.

Presently after this Sr James came and shewed mee a letter hee had receaved from London from the Countess of Morton, who very earnestly desired him to come to her; for shee had intrusted him with the oversight of her jointure, and itt related to ye settling of that and other things of conserne that made her impurtunate for his comming to her. Hee told mee my L. M. was a person who had ever shouen much respect to him, and that hee would willingly serve her La.; butt the cheese thing that would make him now obey her commands was in hopes his beeing att London might bee serviceable to mee if I would imploy him. I said, if his owne convenience would allow of his journy, and that hee did incline to itt, I would writte with him to my sister, who I would oblige to bee civill to him upon my accountt, though hee deserved itt for his owne. Within two days hee went, and I gave my sister such a caracer of him as made his reception liker a brother then a stranger. I reffered much to him to say wch was nott convenientt to writte, and desired her to speake to my brother and give mee accountt what I might expect of his kindnese in the proposall I have lately mentioned, of which I expected noe answearre till Sr James returned.

About a weeke after hee was gone I fell into a feaverish distemper, wch continued some time, so yt I found itt nesesary to send for Doctor Cuningham, wch gave occasion to some people to say that I fell sicke with heartbreake, because Sr James H. was gone to London to marry my Lady Morton; wch report wentt currantt amongst some, though nott beleevd by any that was well aquainted with any of the three; butt this aquainted mee with the humour of some people, that use to make conclusions of there owne rather then seeme ignorant of any thing. By the speedy returne Sr James made hee convinced them of there folly who raised the reports, and brought much sattisfaction to mee by the assurance I had from my sister of beeing very wellcome to her whenever itt was convenientt for mee to come, and till then shee thought itt best to delay speak-ing of any particular to my brother; butt for her husband I might bee secure of his kindnese to bee ever the same I had found itt. Att the same time I allso receaved severall letters from ym who had formerly had much friendship for mee, by wch I found itt had noe abatemennt by the late tryall I had mett with, wch did much incourage mee to kepe my resolution of going to London when ever the season of the yeare would admitt of itt. In the meane time I indeavered the settling of my busynese so as itt might receave noe prejudice by my absence; butt gott so many delays, yett dayly hopes of beeing putt to a close, that itt was the beginning of September '54 before I could take journy, wch I was much asisted to performe by the kindnese and favor of the old Countesse of Dunfermline, who invited mee to goe with her to Pinckey the Satturday before I was to goe for London, and beeing very inquisitive how I was provided for my journy, by my ingenuity her La® found I was nott very certaine of what was convenientt, and upon the Monday when I was comming away my Lady brought mee ten pound, and said if shee had beene better provided shee would have lentt mee more, butt shee had borrowed itt of her Lord. I gave her La® many thankes, who unasked had so civilly asisted mee, and desired to know whether I should make the note of my hand (wch I should send the next day) in my Lord's name or her La®, and shee desired itt might bee in my Lord's name, wch accordingly I did, and paid since I was a widow.

The great civilitys I receaved from all Sr James H. relations made mee without scruple goe to his sister to the Cavers the first night, where hee wentt with mee and his eldest daughter, who staid there till my returne. The youngest hee left att skole in Ed®. Sr James wentt another day's journy with mee, and would have gone further, butt I would nott give him any further trouble, butt urged his returne, and wentt on my journy to Yorke, where I expected to meett the post coach, butt was disapointed, and forced to ride another day's journy. Sr James had an excellent footman, who hee had promised my sister, and sentt him along with mee, who I gave mony to pay for his diett and lodging after we came to ye coach, because I thought itt not reasonable to expect hee could keepe up with itt. After wee had gone halle the first day's journy, and the coachman driving att a great rate, I heard the coachman and postillian saying, "Itt cannott bee a man, itt is a devill, for hee letts us come within sight of him, and then runs faster then the sixe horses." So hee stops the coach, and inquires if any of us had a footman. I told him I had. "Then (said he,) pray make much of him, for I will bee answearable hee is the best in England." When I found hee could hold outt (as hee did all the way), I made him run by the coach; and hee was very usefull to all in itt. That journy brought mee the aquaintance of S'r Witherington and his nephew Mr. Arington, who had one man; and my woman and my selfe was all wee had in the coach. I had discharged my woman and the footman to tell my name to any, butt tooke a borrowed name.

S'r beeing a very civill person, intertained mee with many handsome variety of discourses, and related how hee had designed to goe for Flaunder, and all his things a' ship-board, and while hee was taking his leave the ship sett saile from Newcastle, and so hee was forced to goe by land; w'ch fell outt well for mee, because I could nott have mett with civiller gentlemen; butt I regretted to find they were Roman Catholicks, and by my naming Mr. Fallowfield as one that I had scene, they presently knew who I was, and said they would inquire noe further, for they had heerd him speake of mee as one hee had soe great respect for, as that they would have the same. This Mr. Fallowfield was an old priest that used some time to come to N. Castle when I was there, and had offten writt letters to mee for sicke persons, and highly complemented mee upon there recovery. When I found they did know my name, I told them the reason why I concealed itt was because I had beene long absentt from my freinds, and there had beene many changes since I left them, and thencefore I resolved they should see mee before they heard of mee.

Wee came to High Gate aboutt 2 a' clocke, where I desired to bee left, and writt a note in with the footman to an old servantt of my mother's to take a lodging in some private place in London, and to come to mee the next morning with a coach; w'ch accordingly hee did, and I wentt to White Fryars, where my brother Newton lodging used to bee, and most of those who desired nott to apeare pupl-lickely. I then writt to my sister, who was then and her husband att Warwick, by the footman S'r James H. had sentt her, aquaint-ing her where I was, and that I intended to bee knowne to very few till I heard what shee advised mee to doe; for though I knew the Power that ye governed did att that time indeavour to secure themselves rather by oblesging the Loyall party then ruining them, yett itt was cheefely to such who could doe them most prejudice, and so that was noe security to mee; besides ye dept I had was considerabe, and therfore till I was sure they to whom itt was due would nott attempt any unhandsome action against mee, I thought itt was fitt upon both these considerations to conceale where I was, till I had some way secured myselfe from the inconvenience that I might suffer both upon a puplicke and private accountt.

My sister within three or four days returned backe the footman to mee againe with a very kind letter and twenty pencees, promising to bee with mee as soone as shee could, and till then thought itt best for mee nott to goe any where abroad. In the meane time I employed my mother's old servant to inquiere of some that hee was aquainted with who ruled much in those times what there opinion was of my comming to London; butt there had beene so many changes among themselves, and some who they did much confide in who had left them being convinced of there error, that they looked now the more favorable upon those who had never beene on there side, and did more easily pardon what they acted against them. And this made mee the more secure as to the puplicke; and for my private troubles there was not one who I was really owing any thing to butt they were as civill as I could desire, and as ready as ever to serve mee in what they had that could bee usefull to mee. Having thus farre sattisfied my selfe I only staid now till my sister came, that my going first abroad might bee with her, wh was shortly after. And having made some few visitts to some particular persons, I wentt with her and her husband to Charleton, wh was a howse of theirs within 5 or 6 miles of London. My brother who lived then in the country with his famillly came to see mee, and invited mee to his howse; where I wentt, and staid some time; butt my most constant residence was with my sister, where I knew I was most wellcome to her and her husband; butt sometimes I wentt to London and had a lodging in Crew's mother's howse, where I staid when I had any persons to meett with, in order to setle what I came ther for.

One morning when I was there they brought mee word there was two gentlemen desired to speak with mee, who had brought a letter to mee from the Earle of Callander. I sentt for them up to my chamber, and did something wonder to find the man tremble when hee gave mee the letter, and his lips quiver that hee could hardly speake. I tooke the letter and read itt, concerning a busynese his Lor^ had recomended to my care. I asked who brought itt from Scotland. Hee was nott well able to answere mee, butt pointing to the other man, hee cam and arrested mee. I was strangely surprised, having never mett wth nothing like itt, and asked att whose instance?
Hee pointed to the other who had given mee the letter, and named him Mr. Maitland. I said I thought itt strange upon what accountt hee could doe itt, who I had never seene. Hee said itt was for a dept my brother Will owed his wife, and I promised to pay. I said itt was very strange I should promise to pay what I never till then knew was owing, nor did I ever heare of that woman's name till that time of my comming to London. Yett though all this was true I was forced to give baile, and to answere att Guildhall, w\^ I did by atturny Allen, and though they had hired a man of there owne to come and sweare that I had promised to pay the dept, yett hee so farre contredicted himselfe that itt was visible itt was a cheat, and the bill was flung over the barre; w\^ so exasperated yt wicked woman that there was nothing imaginable that is ill shee did nott say of mee pulplicely in the street, and the interest shee had with the soldiers, who was dayly drinking in her house att the Muse, made all people unwilling to medle with her. Butt I need nott insist upon this, w\^ cost mee deare enough before I ended with her; butt itt hath cost her dearer since, if shee did nott repentt, and if shee did, since the Lord hath forgiven her, I blese him for itt; so did I, as I sentt her word by her husband when I heard shee was dying.

I heard constantly once in a fortnight from Sr James, with many renced testimonys that neither time nor distance had power to change him.

I had not been long at London when I heard C. B. was come there, who sent to me several times to have leave to come once butt to speake to mee, wth I as often positively denied as hee earnestly asked itt. Butt one Sunday night, on the 10th of December '54, after I had suped and was walking alone in my chamber, hee came in, wth I confess strangely surprized mee, so that at first I was nott able to speake a word to him. Butt a little being recollected, I said I thought hee had brought misfortune upon mee enough allready, without adding more to itt by giving new occasion of my being censured for conversing with him. Hee intreated mee to give him leave butt to sit downe by mee a little, and hee would immediately leave mee; wth I did, and hee begun to vindicate himselfe as hee had done often; butt I interrupted him, and told him though my charity would induce mee to beleive him innocent, yet that could bee noe argumentt why I should now allow him liberty to visit mee, since hee could not pretend ignorance of that wth made mee thinke allowable once what were hainously criminall now. Hee said hee desired mee only to resolve him one question, wth was whether or not I was maried to Sr J. II. I asked why hee inquired. Hee said because if I was nott, hee would then propose something that hee thought might bee both for his advantage and mine; butt if I were, hee would wish mee joy, butt never trouble mee more. I said nothing a little while, for I hated lying, and I saw there might bee some inconvenience to tell the truth, and (Lord pardon the equivocation!) I sayd I am (outt alound, and secretttly said nott. Hee immediately rose up and said, "I wish you and him much hapinesse together;" and, taking his leave, from that time to thisa I never saw him nor heard from him; only when hee had gott my wrritings (of what concerned mee left to mee by my mother) wth I had left with him when I wentt outt of London, and hee had taken for security with him when hee wentt first to Holland.

after his escape out of prison, that hee sent them to me with a letter. The liberty hee tooke in comming outt from his concealed lodging upon Sunday was upon an Act made by the Usurper, wth was that none upon any accountt, what ever was there crime, should bee apprehended upon that day, butt should have liberty to goe to any church they pleased, or any other place; which showed a veneryation hee had for that day, though in other things hee forgot obedience where itt was due by the same authority that comanded that day to bee kept holy. Butt when that hipocritte raigned ye people were insnared.

The first post after C. B. had beene with mee, I gave S" Ja. an accountt of itt, who was so farre from beeing unsattisfied with itt, that hee writt mee word if itt were nott that itt might doe mee more prejudice in other people’s thought then itt would doe in his, hee would nott care though I dayly conversed wth him; so litle did hee apprehend any unhandsome action from mee, and therfore itt had beene ye highest unworthy nese and ingratitude to have beeene false to so great a trust as hee repose in mee.

I was above a twelvemonth indeavouring all I could so to setle my affaires that I might have given S" James some incouragementt to come to mee, wth hee often designed to doe, butt I diswaded him from itt till itt might bee with more sattisfaction to himselle, for I knew itt would bee butt a trouble to him to stay long att London or returne withoutt mee, and the ill sucess I had (in my proposalls to my brother) would make one of them nesesary; butt S" James patience beeing long tried, hee would nott bee hindred any longer, butt towards the latter end of the yeare 1655 hee came to London, where I att that time had come for two or three days, and hee returned with mee to Charleton to my sister’s house, where hee staid for the most part while hee continued in England. The constancy of his affection, and the urgency of his desiring mee to marry, made mee now unite all the interest I had either by relation or frendship to gett mony, if nott to pay all I owed, yett such as was most presing; and to accomodate my selfe in some way suitable for what I designed, I employed some againe to try my brother, who (though one of the best natured men living) could nott bee prevailed with either to lend or ingage for one peny for mee; butt I did nott blame him, since the hindrance was from another hand, and that dispointment came to make mee more highly value the kindnese of my brother Newton, who voluntarily lentt mee three hundred pound, and the Countese of Devonshire two hundred, wth was an obligation that I shall never forgett, nor what paines Mr. Neale tooke for mee to perswade her La*, and was bound with mee to her for the mony. I wish I had as much power to requite as I have memory to retaine ye sence of those undeserved favors, and that my reflecting upon them may raise up my thoughts to the adoration and praise of Him who is the fountaine of mercy, and from whom only all blesings are derived.

After this money was receaved and paid where itt was most nes-sary, and ye I had sattisfied all that I knew any thing was due to, I wentt to London for some few days, where Sr James came to mee in order to conclude our mariage, wth I could nott now in reason longer deferre, since the greatest objections I had made against itt was removed, and that I was fully convinced noe man living could doe more to deserve a wife then hee had done to oblige mee; and therefore I intended to give him my selfe, though I could secure him of nothing more, and that was my regrett that I could nott bring him a fortune as great as his affection to recompence his long expectation. Itt was nott withoutt many debates with my selfe that I came att last to bee determined to marry, and the most prevalentt argument that perswaded mee to incline to itt was the extraordinary way that Sr James tooke even in silence to speake what hee thought nesesary to conceale till itt apareed to bee fitt for avowing, and then not to bee discouraged from all ye inconveniences that threatened his pursuit was what I could nott butt looke upon as ordered by the wise and good providence of the Allmighty, whom to resist or nott make use of so good an opertunity as by his mercy was offered to mee I thought might bee offensive to his devine Matr, who in justice might deliver mee up to the power of such sins as might bee a punishment for not making use of the offer of grace to prevent them. And this consideration being added to Sr Jameses worth ended the contraversy. However, lest I might have beene mistaking, or Mr. D. Dickson in his opinion, who thought itt lawfull for mee to marry, I entred nott into that state withoutt most solemnne seeking the determined will of God, wch by fasting and prayer I suplicated to be evidenced to mee, either by hedging up my way with thornes that I might nott offend him, or that hee would make my way plaine before his face, and my paths righteous in his sight. And as I beged this with the fervor of my soule, so itt was with an intire resignation and resolution to bee contentt with what ever way the Lord should dispose of mee. To this I may add S' Paul's attestation, "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, wch is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie nott." (2 Cor. xi. 31.)

Afther this day's devotion was over, every thing that I could desire in order to my mariage did so pleasingly concurre to the consumption of itt, and my owne mind was so undisturbed and so freed of all kind of doubts, that with thankesfullnese I receaved itt as a testimony of the Lord's aprobation, and a presage of my future hapinose; and, blessed bee his name! I was nott disapointed of my hope. Upon Satturday the first of March, 1655-6, Sr James and I wentt to Charleton, and tooke with us Mr. Gaile, who was chaplaine to the Countese of Devonshire, who preached (as hee some times used to doe) att the church the next day, and affter super hee maried us in my brother Newton's clossett, none knowing of itt in the familly or beeing presentt butt my brother and sister and Mr. Neale; though, conforme to the order of those that were then in power, who allowed of noe mariage lawfull butt such as were maried by one of there Justices of Peace, that they might object nothing against our mariage, affter the evening sermon my sister pretending to goe see Justice Elkonhead who was nott well, living att Woolwitch, tooke Sr James and mee with her in the coach, and my brother and Mr. Neale wentt another way affoott and mett us there, and the Justice performed what was usuall for him att that time, wch was only holding ye Directory in his hand, asked Sr James if hee intended to marry mee, hee answered Yes; and asked if I intended to marry him, I said Yes. Then says hee, "I pronounce you man and wife." So calling for a glase of sake, hee drunk and wished much hapinese to us; and wee left him, having given his clarkemy, who gave in parchment the day and witneses, and attested by the Justice that hee had maried us. Butt if itt had nott beene done more solemnly afterwards by a minister I should nott beleved it lawfully done. Aftter I was married I staid butt a short while with my sister, and concealed my marriage from all except some particular persons that either relation or freindship made mee have confidence of, for itt was nott a time for any that honored the King to have any puplckie celebration; and another reason for performing itt privately was that abouttt ten days before I was maried Mrs. Cole, who was Maitland's wife, had arrested mee againe, and I was forced to give in new baile, who were such as I owned my intention of marrying, and going immediately aifter for Scotland, and obliging my selfe to keepe them harmelcse. I left the managemennt of itt to him who before I had imployed for my atturny, who was so confident shee could never recover two pence of mee that hee said hee would bee contentt to pay what ever should bee determined by the judges against mee, for hee said hee could prove by very good witneses that shee said (when her former bill was cast over the barre), "Well, I will have one that shall sweare to the purpose, though I should give him ten pound for his pains." Hee beeing an understanding active man, and giving mee such assurance, made mee with the lese disturbance leave London, for if I had had any apprehension of what affer fell outt I might have easily prevented ye prejudice shee did mee; for 3 yeare affer my atturny died, and my baile beeing in ye country, shee gott outt a judgementt against mee privately, so that none ever heard of itt that was concerned in mee. And though itt cost mee a great deale of trouble and expence (wch to this day I am owing for to Mr. Ncale) to had (sic) that judgement reduced, yet found it impossible, because it was confirmed by the Act of Indemnity, made by the King when his Majesty first came home, wch was much outt of my way, as well as injurious to many others. Butt that was my misfortune, wch I had felt the weight of more heavily if att the same time the King had not been graciously pleased to grant mee 500 pound outt of ye Exchequer. Butt of this I shall have more occasion to speake hereafter.

Sr James and I having taken leave of our friends, came safe without any ill accidentt (in the post coach) the length of Bow Bridge, within mile of Yorke; and there wee had so remarkable a deliverance that I cannot omit the relation of itt. There was none in the coach butt Sr James and I, his man and my woman, and a big fatt gentleman whose name I forgott, butt hee was one that had employmentt under the Bishop of Durham. Aboutt a quarter of a mile before wee came to the bridge that gentleman had lighted outt to walke a little, and came in and satt on the side of the coach wch was contrary to the place hee was in before, wch contributed much to our safety, for Sr James and hee being on the one side of ye coach, and his man in that boot, Crew's weight and mine was the less considerable, who were next to ye danger. Butt all of us had inevitable beene drowned and had our neckes broke, withoutt an extraordinary providence; for 6 horses being in ye coach, and the postillion nott carefull how hee entred the bridge, wch was butt narrow, withoutt any ledges upon itt, and built of the fashion of a bow, from wch itt had the name, hee driving carelessly, both the wheeles of that side where I satt wentt over ye bridge, which the coachman seeing, cried out, "Wee are all lost," and flung himselfe outtt of the coach boxe, and to escape hurt his leg very ill, so that hee could hardly gett up to pull the horses to him; nor was there scarce roome upon the bridge to give any assistance. Butt that wch was our preservation was some good angell I thinke (sentt by his Master), who, seeing the danger wee were in, held the coach behind all the way till itt was off the bridge. Itt was so extraordinary a deliverance that wee knew not how to bee thankfull enough to God Allmighty who had given itt, butt resolved to reward the man who had beene instrumentall in itt; butt when wee all came outt of the coach att the end of the bridge, and inquired for ye man, there was none to be scene, nor had wee all that day mett or overtaken any traveller, only that man was scene by Hary Macky and the coachman to hold up the coach along the bridge, butt they both declared they never saw him before nor after ye danger, and that wth made itt appeare the more strange was that hee seemed to bee butt a poore man, and such doth nott usually doe any service without seeking a recompense. Butt whatever hee was, itt was hee the Lord made use of as a meanes of our safety, and the less wee knew of his comming, the more wee had reason to bee thankfull to Him who brought him there. When wee came to Yorke, and related what wee had escaped, itt was the admiration of all that heard itt. The coachman and postillion was very penitentt for there fault, and therfore wee forgave them; butt would make noe more use of them, for wee hired another coach to Newcastle, where Sr James had apointed his owne horses and servantts to meett him, because hee intended to see his sisters as hee wentt home, wth hee did, and wee came safe withoutt any other accidentt to the Cavers, where I was receaved with much kindness by all, butt most from Sr Jameses daughter, who I had left there, and was very well pleased to returne home with mee, wth shee did after some days stay att Cavers.

When wee came to Ed, I sentt my excuse for nott beeing fitt then to waite upon my Lady Broghill, who was then there with her Lord, who was Presidentt of the Counsell, butt resolved to come there againe only to pay that respect wth I had for them both, nott as they were then imploys, butt as I had long beene intimatly aquainted with them before, and knew that what they acted now was more outt of a goode designe than an ill, as was evidentt by the civility they shewed to all ye Royallists. After wee came home, and had receaved a very kind welcome from all Sr James his friends and neibours, and that wee were a little setled, hee thought itt convenient for us to goe over, as I promised, to waite upon my Lady Broghill; and the reason whch made Sr James the sooner doe itt was, that severall gentlemen who had ingaged to serve under the English power in puplicke imployementt as Justices of Peace had presed to have Sr James one of that number, butt hee declining, they made his name bee inserted in the list, with this certification, that whoever refused to act in that station who was nominate should bee sentt to ye Castle att Edw. This made us hasten our journy; and as soone as wee came there, a gentleman (who I will nott now name, because I hope hee repents what hee then did,) that had beene very urgentt with Sr James to accept ye imploymcntt, came and importunately presed him againe, and, to make mee ye better sattisfied with the proposall, told mee many advantages hee would receave by itt, and was very desirous that hee might goe with mee to make my aquaintance with my Lady Broghill. I excused my going att such times as hee mentioned, only because I would nott have him with mee, nor did I take notice as if I had ever seene her. Butt as soone as I was free of him I wentt presently after dinner.

They lay then in the Earle of Muray howse in the Canon Gate, and just as I came in att ye gate my Lord Broghill was going outt, and with him a great attendance, and amongst the rest yt gentleman who had beene so forward to have Sr James putt in to bee a Justice of Peace. Hee was a little surprisde when he saw my Lord Br. come with so much freedome and kindnese and bid mee wellcome, and bringing mee to ye staiers, asked if I had any service for him. I said, "My Lord, though there hath beeene many sad changes since I saw your Lor, yett I still look upon you as the same person you were, and threfore in short I am come to beg your Lor favour to Sr James, who I heare is in the list." "Why! (said hee,) hath hee nott a mind to be a Justice?" "Noe, my Lord, so farre from itt, that hee will goe to ye Castle first." "Well, my word for it, (replied hee,) you shall never heere of itt more." Beeing then in hast, going up to some committee, hee left mee with his Lady, and ingaged me to dine with them ye next day; wch I did, and had all ye assurance I could desire that Sr James should bee free from having any thing imposed upon him that was contrary to the duty and Loyalty that became a faithfull subject.

After two or three days stay in Edw wee returned home, and presently after came the order to Sr James either to joyne with the other Justices of Peace or goe to the Castle. When I saw itt I confesse I was much disordred, and the more because I had such confidence of my Ld B. word. I desired Sr James to tell the messenger that ye next weeke hee would doe one of them if desired, and immediately I writt a letter to my Lord B. telling how much I was surprized with that order, after I had his Lor^p promise to have

MEDITATIONS.

Upon the Fast which by Proclamation was kept Jan. 30, 1660-1.

This is a day on which the greatest murder was committed that ever story mentioned, except the Crucifying of our Saviour.

Had not his Majesty * come under all those tryalls and sufferings, how should the world and his owne subjects have knoune his piety, patience, his meekenese and his charity, his constancy in suffering, and the heavenly ejaculations which upon all ocations hee offered up to God in his solitudes? Which like monuments are left to future generations to teach them how to follow what was eminent in him.

The Scotts are blamed, and surely they deserve it, if it were butt for being too credulous; but lett them that are without this sin of being guilty of the King’s murder in the Three Nations cast the first stone att the other, for either simply, willfully, or passively all are guilty, and therefore all had need to bee humbled greatly for so hainous a transgression.

Upon the death of my deare Son Henry, being the 12 of May, 1661.

What a sad journy hath this beeene hether to mee into England where I expected greatest satisfaccion: 1st. in seeing the King and Royall family restored, and then in seeing my relations and friends; and to mitigate these joys the Lord is pleased dayly to send mee new afflictions,

* Charles the First.
and to take away all most the cheefe comforts of my life, which is my deare children, the first as being best beloved, and this as next succeeding, and all to teach mee nott to love the world or anything that is in itt. I was nott a witnesse of my deare Hary's suffering as I was of his sister's, butt by relation itt was a long lirring sicknese, every day threatening death, and att last it came, to putt an end to his mortality just in the night of that day of the weeke (beeing Sunday\textsuperscript{a}) that hee first receaved breath; and had hee lived one month longer hee had beene just three yeare seeing the world and feeling the bitternese of itt, for seldom had hee health to make him sensible of those joys which accompany every age, for every one hath something suitable to itt where the blesing of health is to make them sensible of them.

\textit{Upon making vows.}

I never was in any affliction or distresse butt I was apt to make vows, and I noe sooner was delivered butt I forgott them. Even lately I have had experience of my selfe; for, having long since vowed that if I could live to see that day on which the crowne should be sett upon the King's head, I would, during my life, make that a day of particular devotion for beslings upon him, and yett for all there hath beene butt feu Tuesdays past by mee, yet halfe of them I have nott remembred till they were past, which makes mee now resolve never to vow anything againe butt to bee humbled, that I cannott performe them as I would, and as the benefitts require.

\textit{Upon the disbanding of the Army, and the disorder that followed.}

Who is now living that did ever expect to see this day? That so great and so successful an army, who gave laws to Three Kingdomes and cutt off there lawfull King, that set up and pulled downe who they pleased, that this army should be disbanded withoutt any resistance only by the vote of King and Parliament.

\textsuperscript{a} Sunday, the 13th of June, 1658, as in p. 57 of the same volume.
Sure itt would appeare these people's inclinations were to bee obedient if they had had such officers and rulers as would have shewed them good example, butt mostt generally the multitude is like an impetuous inundation, which runs most violently any way itt takes. Therfore they are wise who can sett them forward towards what is good and allowable, and then unquestionably they will run like a well biased bowle that way itt is directed by the thrower. Men may imagine reasons to themselves for these late unheard of changes, from good to ill, and from ill to good againe; butt certainly the hand of God is visible in all these altertions. Els how could itt have bee ne posible for a good and a greatly beloved King to have bee ne murdered publickly before his owne gates by a hand-full of people (in comparison of the rest), and none made resistance butt with sighes and teares? How could this have bee ne done had nott the Lord for a just punishment of our sins taken from us power, strength, and wisdome?

How could the vilest of the people bee ne submitted to by so many better then themselves, who complied with them, had nott God taken from them there reason and there honor?

How could so many men have lost there lives both in England and Scotland for intending to restore the King and owning of his interest, and then to have him brought home in peace by the unanimous desire of the generallity of the people? how could this have bee ne done butt by that God who only doth determine of life and death and times and seasons?

There is a time for all things, says the wise man (Eccles. iii. 1); there was a time for the King to suffer exile, and all his subjects to bee enslaved, and a time for him to bee restored; butt till this time came that God had apointed for itt all industry was fruitlese.

Now itt seemes this was the time and by this meanes that this army was to bee disbanded, and from this many expected peace and quiett, which they thought could nott bee as long as such men were in armes that had done so much against the royall power.

"Scatter the people that delight in warre," was a prayer made long since by the Psalmist (Psalm lxviii. 30); and now wee see that prayer made good so many ages after to lett us see there never was a prayer putt up in faith, either from a person or people, butt had a returne att some time or other. But to let us see the rules we prescribe our selves, as means to attaine our ends, proves most times the contrary (yet ought none from this forbeare to doe what's most agreeable to reason, and leave the success to Him who makes all things worke together for good to them that feare Him). The disbanding of this army was looked upon as a thing impossible without great mutiny; and the keeping it together seemed very dangerous; and yet how willingly every man went to his owne home att these severall days of dicipation, with the apearance of joy and acclamation, and praying for the King, who liberally rewarded there last actions though there former had beene so rebellious.

From this, which some made a ground to expect peace, others take occation to raise disturbance, and are nott afraid to intitle God to bee the owner of there quarrell and rebellion; but Hee who sitts in Heaven will laugh at there folly, and make them a derision unto all that hate them, because they have blasphemeed the name of the Most High and rebelled against the Lord and His anoynted.

1660-1, January 6, 7, 9. What disturbance hath those men made these three nights in one of the most populous and best governed citty's in the world! and yett they are butt a handfull in comparison of the multitude that were against them; butt a gangrene in the least degree begun hazords the lose of the whole body if not cutt off in time, and, since the multiplied mercys of a gracious and indulgent King cannot reclaime them, his severity must be made use of, and by letting bloud to purge outt that corruption which els might be infectious.

Upon the meeting that was to determine of Church goverment, being upon Tuesday, 3rd of November, 1661.

This day the Parliament hath apointed to debate or determine of the goverment of the Church, or more properly, I may say, to determine of those ministers who will nott bee conforme to the goverment allready intended to bee established, for I cannot say it is firmly established when in most parts of the kingdome itt meets with oposition. Questionlese the generallity of the kingdome is inclined to Episcopisy as being the ancient government of this Church, and what many of the laws are built upon; yet that will not persuade others to bee of there judgement, because they are possesed with a prejudice against it. There may bee ill Bishops, butt that should be looked upon as they are men, and nott bring a disrespect upon there function, for what man living is withoutt sin?

* * * * * * * * *

In fundamentalls both agree, Episcopall and Presbiterian, and yett none more violent then they one against another for the shadow; for such is the name of Bishop or ceremonys in comparison of that truth which is the substance. Did both sides seeke sincarry the glory of God, and the salvation of the soules committed to there charge, they would imploy themselves better then to make disturbances to the distraction of many soules as well as bodys. Were there a holy emulation which should come nearest to there head and master the Lord Christ, who said, “Learne of mee, for I am meeke and lowly in hart,” (Matthew xi. 29,) then undoubtedly they should obtaigne what follows,--they should have rest unto there soules, and should nott only have peace, butt many blessings that attenditt.

* * * * * * * * *

To conclude these meditations concerning the King, I am fully perswaded the Lord hath designed him to bee an heire of glory and an instrument of much praise to himselfe by being a reformer both by his lawes and his practise, and till the time come I will dayly pray for the hastening of it: and as his Majesty shewed great magnanimity and courage in his undaunted resolution of being crowned the apointed day, though the phanatickes, both in words and papers flung into the King's court att Whitehall, had with much boldness affirmed as from some inspiration that the crowne should never be sett upon his head, and that from these threats and more deliberate thoughts some faithfull to his Majesties interests did endeavour to diswade from keeping the intended day for coronation, because itt fell to bee a day on which there was an eclipse of the sun, and that might confirme some in there thoughts of his Majesties unhappy reigne; butt to this the King would nott condescend, butt with a Christian fortitude replied hee feared neither the threats nor the omen, because hee knew the Lord overuled all such events, and therefore hee would keep his first resolution and rely upon God for his blesing and preservation.

And that the God of power and glory may be praised I must record what I was witness of my selfe when his Majestie ridd from the Tower to Whitehall the day before the coronation, which was one of the greatest solemnitys that I believe ever Brittaine saw. Though the King had great and royall attendance and faithfull servauntts, yett such was the multitude of beholders that crowded in aboutt the King that his servaunts were not able to keepe aboutt the horse on which his Majestie did ride, and I saw very many meane ordinary persons laying there hands upon the horse and the rich trapings, which putt mee into that terrour for feare of some attempt upon his Majesties person that itt tooke away the satisfaction that els I should have had in so glorious a sight; butt I turned my feares into prayers, and was heard in that I feared, and the Lord granted my requests, and none had power to hurt him, praised be the Lord of mercy for it! Butt while I was thus conflecting with my feares the King rode on with a serene undisturbed composure, free either from feare or vanity, and seemed to be pleased with the liberty the rude multitude tooke to aproach him, who certainly was restrained from there ill designes by the same spiritt that said, Touch nott my Anointed.

The next day, being Tuesday, his Majestie was crowned, notwithstanding all the oposition threatened by the phanatikes; and some time after coronation there was the most terrible tempest of thunder, lightening, and raine that ever I saw, so that I feared some danger to his Majestie in his returne from Westminster coming by watter to Whitehall, where I waited, and had the honor to have the first kiss of his Majesties hand after coming into the Howse; and on my knees, with an uplifted hart and soule, I beged that God would crowne his Majestie with all the blessings both of heaven and earth, for I was transported to see the King come sodainely into the room where I was alone waiting and praying for his Majesties safe arrivall, for the storme was such as if his enemys had conspired with the Prince of the power of the aire; butt for that day's mercy to the King I did resolve (and have hitherto kept itt) upon every Tuesday to make a solemnne acknowledgement of the mercy in giving God thankes for setting the crowne that day upon his Majesties head, and in most humble fervent intercessions and suplications for his Majesties long, holy, and prosperous raigne.

One remarke I must nott omitt, which was, after the crowne had beene sometime upon the King's head, the weight of itt made his Majesties head to ache, for which he tooke itt off and held itt in his hand; and some from that made presages of the short continance of his Majesties raigne; butt, oh! how unreasonable and irreligious is all such observations! Had I beene witnesse of that (which my being great with child made mee nott venture into such a crowd) I had interpreted rather that his Majestic tooke off his crowne with reverence to adore the King of Kings, who had sett itt on his head, in imitation of the foure and twenty Elders who cast there crownes before the throne, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receave glory and honor and power, for Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created;" and noe doubt butt as the weight of itt upon his Royall head putt him in mind of the great and weighing cares that attend a crowne, so the taking itt off was with an offering itt up and himselfe to the Lord and seeking a blessing upon his people and himselfe, and that that crowne might bee a pledge to him of that etternall crowne that fadeth nott butt continueth for ever. These and such like I believe were his Majesties thoughts during that solemnity.

Meditations and Resolutions upon Luke ii. 36, 37, and 38 verses.

(P. 51.) For though I did not talke away sermons as too too many did (which the Lord pardon), yett that is an agravation of my guilt, that I saw that sin in them, and did nott amend it in myselfe the secrett wandrings of my heart, which tooke mee vp as much from hearing as there discourses did them.

(P. 64.) When I was young, I fasted weekly every Wednesday from the example of a lady, whom I believe did itt outt of a pious consideration, butt I had then noe other reason butt only to shew I could forbeare all kind of sustenance twenty-four hours; butt as I grew older and more acquainted with my duty I found fasting a great helpe to prayer and humiliation, and in the yeare 1644 I did then wholy sett apart that day for seeking mercy to reconcile the sad differences that was betwixt the King and his people and to mourn for the sins that occasioned itt. Sometime when seriously I wentt aboutt that dutty I have felt the peace which paseth all natturall understanding, and so for a long time I continued itt; butt when I att any time made a mocke of itt by only forbearing to eate, butt nott forbearing to sin, then was itt truly made a day for mee to mourn for while I have life.

Since I grew old I found fasting prejudiciall to my health, and therfore I laid itt aside, as believing our Lord would pardon the omitting what I was nott well able to performe, and since though I do nott fast every Wednesday, yett I make that still a day of confession of the sins I was guilty of when I did fast, and since I did forbeare. And every Satturday now, since that day the Lord made mee a widow, I have endeavord to spend itt in holy abstenance and retirement. And how to improve itt more shall bee now my care and to try all ways how to serve the Lord with fasting and prayers night and day.

Kneeling in Prayer.

Though in this Church that cousttem is outt of use of kneeling in the time of prayer, and that for the most part all the congregation sitts rather like judges or auditors then those that were making suplication, as if they had so farre committed there cause to the minister's prayer that they need neither joyne with him themselves nor add anything for there owne nesesitous condittion, Lord convince them of the evil of this way that are guilty off itt.
